Furthermore, the Minutemen are rested. Siena and UMass mutually agreed to cancel a game originally scheduled for tonight at Bleeker Stadium in Albany, N.Y., because of Siena's final exam schedule, already underway. That cancellation gave UMass a total of six days off to focus, menatlly and physically, for Rutgers.

"We've been able to relax mentally for the past three or four days," Stone noted. "At this point in our season it's good to relax a little . . . we played a lot of games last week. Now it's time for us to get focused."

Rutgers has certainly been focused since their last stop in Amherst two weekends ago. After losing 5-1, 3-0 to the Minutemen before a rainout prompted the scheduling of Saturday's twin bill, the Scarlet Knights have been on a roll. They are 8-0-1 since facing UMass and have improved greatly, according to Michael Matts of Rutgers Sports Information.

"We've really turned the corner," said Matts. "We've been fielding better and our pitching has improved."

Rutgers swept A-10 rivals Rhode Island last weekend, a sweep that kept UMass from clinching the Eastern title against Temple. Other wins of note in that stretch include victories against Lafayette, Iona, C.W. Post (the college, not the cereal), Columbia and Fordham.

"I think their people will be ready, their pitchers will be ready," predicted Stone of Rutgers. "I expect to see a completely different Rutgers team than we saw three weeks ago."

Pitcher Jim Kohl and second baseman Doug Alongi have spurred the Scarlet Knight turnaround. Kohl was named this week's Wilson/Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Week for the second time this season. Kohl, who leads the Rutgers staff with a 2.94 earned run average, earned the award by picking up three saves over the past week. Kohl has a 7-6 record and four saves in 21 appearances.

On the offensive front, Alongi brings 20 stolen bases and a 13-game hitting streak to Lorden Field along with a team-high

Heart problems plague Bush for second day

By TERENCE HUNT
AP White House

BETHESDA, Md. — President Bush experienced an irregular heartbeat for a second day and remained hospitalized last night. "Don't worry about me," an upbeat Bush shouted to reporters from the window of his fourth-floor suite.

Barbara Bush said the president would spend the night at Bethesda Naval Hospital. "I'm going home to bed. He's going to bed," Mrs. Bush told reporters as she departed for the White House last evening.

The White House maintained a news blackout on Bush's condition since mid-morning, when spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said the president was continuing to experience an irregular heartbeat.

Fitzwater reported then that tests on Bush showed no sign of heart damage or any evidence of a heart attack. Doctors administered a second drug to restore Bush's heart to normal rhythm and said it was not unusual that he had not responded immediately to the first medication.

Bush was in a jovial mood when he poked his head out of his fourth-floor hospital suite to talk to reporters.

Asked if his heart were still beating irregularly, Bush joshed, "Yes, can't you hear it?"

Pointing at his heart, Bush said, "It's a question of this getting back to normal."

Mrs. Bush said the president felt great.

Fitzwater said that if Bush did not respond adequately to the medication, he could undergo a procedure today that would shift the power of the presidency briefly to Vice President Dan Quayle.

The procedure would be an electrical cardioversion, described by Fitzwater as "a single application of direct electrical current to the heart — one very quick jolt." The purpose would be to restore the president's normal heartbeat.

Under the procedure, Bush would be under anesthesia for several minutes. Under the 25th Amendment to the Constitution, Bush could and would shift presidential powers to Quayle

Decisive political agenda change seen in First District

By JOHN DIAMOND
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Regardless of who wins the special congressional election between Republican Steven Pierce and Democrat John Olver, the Massachusetts congressional delegation will be changed profoundly.

A victory by Pierce in the June 4 final election would keep the Republican hold on the First District seat vacated by the death of Rep. Silvio Conte. Pierce would carry on Conte's function as the only delegation member with easy, quick access to the White House.

But Pierce would represent a sharp turn in political philosophy from Conte's brand of liberal Republicanism. He would add a conservative element to one of the nation's most liberal delegations.

An Olver win would fill a liberal Republican's seat with a liberal Democrat. Olver would provide continuity for many of the social policy and human services views espoused by Conte, particularly a shared support for education programs.

But an Olver win would also leave Massachusetts with a one-party delegation for the first time since 1875 when Civil War-era Republicans still dominated state politics. Massachusetts would have by far the largest one-party delegation in the country with 11 House members and two senators. And the First District seat would be held by a Democrat for the first time since 1893.

With so much at stake in Washington, politics here are getting involved in the fray.

President Bush is planning to appear at an event with Pierce on May 24 in Boston, possibly a fund-raiser, said White House aide Andrew Card.

"Believe it or not the First District is hard to get to," said Card, explaining the decision to have the President campaign in Boston rather than the largely rural, Western Massachusetts district.

On Olver's side, the National Abortion Rights Action League is planning to continue its campaign against Pierce, who has an anti-abortion voting record.

"We want to do whatever it takes to ensure that the voters know that John Olver supports and will work to secure a woman's right to choose and that Steven Pierce doesn't trust the women of Massachusetts to make their own decision on abortion," said Loretta Ucelli, a NARAL spokeswoman. "And Pierce has voted consistently anti-choice."

NARAL spent $75,000 in the primary against anti-abortion candidates of both parties and could surpass that amount in the final election.

Most political observers say the election over so short a time span is too close to call. Voter turnout, which was disappointingly small in the primary, could determine the outcome in the final election.

Pierce considers himself the underdog. The day after the primary, he challenged Olver to a series of debates, a strategy typical of a candidate who believes he must gain ground.

"It's hardly a Republican district," Pierce said before the primary.

White House political advisor Ron Kaufman said the GOP isn't outing the First District in the bank.

"Any district that's only 13 percent Republican is going to be very difficu1t for us to hold," Kaufman said. "It is such a liberal district. It is the most liberal district in Massachusetts. It's going to be very hard for us."

Pierce, who says he is a middle-of-the-road Republican, not a right-winger, says First District voters will follow their own instincts, not the dictates of Washington-based lobbying groups.

But in that past those instincts have led the district to support George McGovern for president in 1972, Jimmy Carter twice, and Michael Dukakis by a wide margin in 1988.

Olver is unabashedly liberal and says his views reflect those of the district. But Pierce hopes to tie Olver to the unpopular fiscal policies of former Gov. Dukakis.

The national Democratic Party hopes to pick up the Conte seat. Of three open seats for which special elections are being held this spring and summer, the First District Massachusetts is the one the Democrats hope to capture, according to Laura Nichols, spokeswoman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

"This is really the only one that's in play for us," Nichols said. An open seat in Texas is considered a Republican lock. Another in Illinois is likely to be dropped in the 1992 redistricting.

"The Republicans are going to pull out all the stops to win this election," Nichols said. "They will have resources at their disposal that we don't expect to have."

Health center wrongdoings alleged

BOSTON (AP) — A mental health center in Springfield has funneled nearly $1 million in state money into companies owned by its three founders, according to a published report.

When asked in state forms to disclose ties with related companies, the Center for Humanistic Change has insisted that it deals only at arm's length with enterprises that rent it homes for the mentally retarded and lease it cars, furniture and office equipment. The center, the state's fourth-largest provider of services to the mentally retarded, is a non-profit group with 330 clients.

But Albert J. Dias, one of the organization's founders and its longtime executive director, has been directing state money into two real estate trusts and a leasing company that he and the two other founders — C. Thomas Compagna and Louis Gallinaro — have owned for several years, the Boston Sunday Globe reported. Dias said they relinquished control of the equipment-leasing corporation in 1989.

According to the newspaper, the undisclosed interests have been a key factor in gaining increased compensation for the center, which now has $5 million in annual public contracts to set up homes.

The center has been free to charge higher fees for rents and equipment by sidestepping a state law that regulates how much a nonprofit company can be reimbursed by the state for services from a "related party," the Globe said.

The newspaper said the exact scope of the Springfield trio's profits is not known because the state has spotty records on the center's finances and vendor contracts.

However, in examining the extensive real estate holdings, a Globe analysis shows they used state funds to help build equity in 10 properties valued in excess of $1.3 million while pocketing an estimated $30,000 in profits in the last two years.

Dias, 40, the center's only executive director since its inception in 1979, denied that he had violated any laws in the center's quest to help the mentally retarded, and that he and his associates profit excessively from the center.

10th annual Lesbian and Gay Pride March held

Amid celebration, bisexuals decry exclusion

By TRYSTAN SKEIGH
Collegian Staff

Northampton's Main Street was filled with over 2,000 people marching, waving banners and signs, singing, chanting, smiling and waving during the 10th annual Lesbian and Gay Pride March Saturday.

People began to gather around noon at Lampron Park. Groups unfurled multicolored banners, and a women's band from Northampton warmed up the crowd with a variety of tunes before the march began.

Yet amid the bright colors and music, tension was evident among the marchers. Most of the University of Massachusetts Lesbian Bisexual Gay Alliance contingent marched near the Western Massachusetts contingent of Queer Nation behind a banner stressing gay, lesbian and bisexual unity.

At one point the Queer Nation contingent, walking behind a banner stressing "diversity," began chanting "Hey, Hey, Ho, Ho, Biphobia's go to go!"

Patti, a Valley resident and member of Queer Nation who asked her last name be withheld, said the chant was to address the fear "by including 'bisexuals' in the march it will take away the focus on gay and lesbian power.

"All different sexualities need to be included. That's our power," Patti said. She added the groups need to unify together.

Sandy Costigan, one of the march's "peacekeepers," who described herself as a lesbian resident of the Pioneer Valley, said bisexuals were welcome to march, but she did not believe "bisexual" belonged in the march's title. She said she felt others needed to remember and respect the march's history. "Ten years ago this march started out a lesbian liberation march."

"Look at this march — gays, lesbians, Jews, bi's, straights, are marching and they're all vocal. But they're not all in the title," she said. "Why can't the bisexuals go along with that?"

Bet Power, curator of the New Alexandria Lesbian Library, marched behind a banner supporting lesbians and gays who practice sado-masochism. She said this is the first year there's been an S/M banner in this parade. "We decided to march this year partly because of the encouragement of Queer Nation," she said.

The march stopped in front of the City Hall where six counter-demonstrators held posters citing biblical scripture against homosexuality. One man shouted through a megaphone. Marchers responded by chanting "Shame, Shame."

One of the counter-demonstrators, who refused to be identified, said the group was from the Faith Baptist Church in Northampton. She said she wanted people to understand the group "chose Scripture as the basis for every poster. This isn't just our opinion — it's based on the Bible."

Sabrina Sojourner, a Black lesbian and winner of the 1990 Pioneer Black Journalism Award given by the Atlanta Association of Black Journalists spoke at a rally following the march. She is a director of racial-diversity programs for the National Organization for Women and is on the Board of Directors for the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force.

Sojourner stressed the need for unity between the gay and lesbian community and other oppressed groups. "We need to agree to oppose many 'isms' — we need to understand that we all have to have unity and take a stand."

Sojourner encouraged different parts of the community to learn from each other.

Sabrina Sojourner addresses the crowd following the Gay and Lesbian Pride March Saturday in Northampton.

"Specifically to the men in this audience, women have experience you can use. . . let us teach you what we know."

Longtime Northampton resident and award-winning lesbian writer and playwright, Sarah Dreher, who served on the march committee, also spoke at the rally.

Dreher noted the Valley lesbian community "is one of the oldest, largest, strongest lesbian communities in the country."

Amy Stammer, a Northampton resident and member of Queer Nation, said she does not believe including 'bisexual' in the march's title "dilutes the issue [of lesbian rights]."

"We need to recognize the diversity within our community, if the title stays gay and lesbian, it makes us all look pretty homogenous . . . we want recognition of bi's, S/M'ers, transvestites and transsexuals too," she said.

David Macy, founder of "a.i.d.s.ALIVE!"

She said the lesbian community has faced a lot of opposition throughout the March's history, and this year, bisexuals, suffering from "lesbo-phobia," "did everything in their power to undermine the march."

Dreher said she felt the issue of the march's title had been "needlessly exploited" to cause controversy. She stressed the issue was what the march's focus should be.

"This is not to deny the bisexual community, some feel bi's should be included in the title because they suffer oppression, yet some of us feel it takes more than oppression to make a community," she said. Dreher's speech drew boos and hisses, along with applause.

Lyzann Harlow, another lesbian resident of the Valley, said she felt the bisexual groups needed to understand the source of their oppression is society's prejudice against lesbians and gays.

"It's not women sleeping with women who piss off the patriarchy, it's women who don't sleep with men who become the targets of the patriarchy," she said.

spoke of the devastating effects of AIDS on the gay community. Macy, himself diagnosed with the disease, urged people to support those who have been diagnosed.

Other speakers included openly-gay Michael Duffy, commissioner for the Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination, and Elisa Campbell, bisexual chair of the Amherst Selectboard.

Both Duffy and Campbell urged gays, lesbians and bisexuals to become involved in the political process. Duffy said he has never been harassed, and Campbell, who recently came out as bisexual in a multicultural workshop for town officials in Amherst, also said she has received only support.

Campbell said, "It's important for all minority groups to participate in the political process. It's one way of making change — it helps change attitudes when people see some one in a respected position who is a member of a minority group."

Duffy especially encouraged women to run for office. "They will say you're too militant. . . but we still have sodomy laws in this Commonwealth — that's a reason to be militant."

Mad Ave methods used to help close student shortages

By JON MARCUS
Associated Press

CAMBRIDGE – Anika Larsen never got so much mail as when she started to consider where to go to college.

"I kept it for the first few days, but after a while, it got ridiculous," said the 17-year-old senior and top student at Rindge and Latin School, a public high school. "It just kept piling up. There were all these college catalogs full of beautiful pictures of wonderful schools, but after a while it made you think, they can't all be this wonderful."

Despite receiving literally hundreds of pieces of mail from colleges that hoped to coax her to apply, Larsen said she never strayed from her initial choice: Yale University, where she expects to be a theater studies major.

If that hadn't worked out, another school whose name she can't remember offered Larsen $16,000 in scholarships – and she hadn't even applied there.

With the number of traditional-age college students rapidly declining, and the cost of college going up, admissions officers are using Madison Avenue techniques to fill their classrooms.

"Kids are getting direct mail by the pound," said Duncan Murdoch, dean of undergraduate admissions at the University of Southern California. "We all are trying to out-slick each other."

The schools have been resorting to consultants, telemarketing, glossy catalogues, promises of hefty scholarships, laser videodisc promotions, focus groups, direct-mail advertising, all expenses-paid campus visits and personal phone calls from celebrity alumni, students, faculty and college presidents.

"Schools are fearful of losing the competitive edge," said Tim Willoughby, dean of admissions at Drake University in Des Moines, Iowa, which has advertised on the cable music channel MTV.

Ingersoll, Williams and Associates, a Denver enrollment management consulting firm says private colleges will spend an average of from $1,200 to $2,000 recruiting every student who enrolls, and public universities $350 to $750.

"Most institutions derive most of their income from tuition," said Mike Maxey, vice president for admissions at Roanoke College in Roanoke, Va. "Institutions are under tremendous pressure to keep that income coming in."

Roanoke this year sent too prospective applicants personalized letters from the mayor of Roanoke, a congressman who is an alumnus and others. One senior at a Connecticut private school got 14.

"In the current environment, you do everything you can that's ethical, " said Maxey.

The number of 18 to 24-year-olds has fallen almost 10 percent since 1985, meaning there are nearly 3 million fewer potential college students, according to the American Council on Education.

The average college-bound student new gets more than 200 unsolicited mailings from universities, marketing officials said. Northern and western universities send photographs of students skiing. Southern schools include full-color pictures of their students on the beach.

"Last year, people came up short" of freshmen, said Don Lightfoot, senior consultant at Image Presentation, a Boston firm whose clients include Harvard University and 200 other schools.

"Heads are rolling. A new regime has come in of people who are really aggressively promoting their institutions. Admissions people have to be salespeople more than ever."

Latin mottos about truth and knowledge have given way to advertising slogans. Morningside College in Sioux City, Iowa, calls itself "The Way College Ought To Be." The University of Florida is "Worth Leaving Home For." The University of Montevallo in Alabama is "The New Standard of Value," Southwestern College of Kansas is "A Class Act."

New consulting firms now offer geodemographic research to help a school identify desirable potential students based on ZIP code, income, ethnic origin and other factors.

"This is not a counseling process to speak of any more," said Dick Canterbury of Epsilon Data, a consulting firm that helps admissions offices send personalized letters to high school students based their prospective college majors. "It's a very forceful selling process."

"There's a fine line between education and business, and sometimes we lose sight of the fact that we're here to help students make a good match," Kevin Mayne, dean of admissions at Green Mountain College in Poultney, Vt. "A lot of the things that are going on really sicken me. There are schools that are sending out airplane tickets and T-shirts."

Green Mountain in 1985 ended the practice of mailing ski-lift tickets to prospective applicants to lure them to the campus. Mayne will be a panelist on June at the New England seminar on ethics in admissions.

Pills to solve all your ills

It took Einstein his whole life to figure out the theory of relativity. You have six hours.

The Vivarin ad goes something like that.

Finals time must be very profitable for Vivarin and No-Doz. Students hit the panic button. Many of us (yours truly included) tend to blow off reading, papers and studying until we have approximately 30 seconds to cram an entire semester's worth of studying in our brains. This means all-nighters, which also means lots of coffee, Jolt, and of course, legal speed (also known as Vivarin and No-Doz).

This stuff is supposed to keep us awake. Somehow, according to the ads, it will give us instant knowledge about our calculus exam. The magic pill strikes again.

Pamela McCarthy

We have lots of magic pills for our problems. If you want to lose weight, take a diet pill. No hassles, no worries, no nothing. Forget about anything as tiresome as diets. Just keep popping the pills. It's easy.

Insomnia is easily cured with a sleeping pill. Let's forget that if it has been going on for a while, there may be something physically wrong. But, hey, why get it checked out when we can pop a pill declared safe by a few quacks the company surveyed?

I'm not talking about taking an asprin when you have a headache, or taking some cold medicine if you're all stuffed up and can't breathe. I'm talking about pills we take to deal with a problem that isn't medical.

Welcome to the land where anything can be accomplished, compliments of a pill.

Panic over "bad" drugs is widespread. Crack, pot, acid, heroin and cocaine are our big concern. The news is full of stories about drug busts and killings. George Bush declared war on drugs. Anti-drug advertisements abound, the most popular being "Just say no" to drugs, and "This is your brain on drugs" (funny, looks a lot like an egg to me). Drugs are our national obsession. Crime, unemployment, social problems, and violence are all blamed on drugs. Drugs are everyone's major fear. They are our favorite scapegoat.

Drugs are everyone's major comfort, also.

They don't have to be illegal to be a problem. Many are even prescribed by doctors, the people we are supposed to trust. It's one thing to get something for pain, or for illness. It's another thing to get some pills thrown in our face over something that runs deep, such as depression. I don't see what a lifetime supply of Valium can do, except give you an addiction to deal with. Grand. That's just what every person afflicted with depression needs.

It isn't likely that taking a few Vivarin to stay awake will make an addict out of anyone. But if we keep relying on pills to do simple things like cope with finals, we may be addicted in a new way. We may be used to turning to pills when things get bad.

UMass needs Latino courses

A couple of weeks ago while registering for classes, I realized that there were no classes on this campus devoted to the Latino experience in this country. Not one class focused on my unique experience as Latino-American immigrant. I went down to Bilingual Collegiate Program with the hope that someone would pull out a list and say, "Here you go, take these classes and you'll get what you want." That didn't happen because no such classes exist.

-Why, I asked.

-I don't know.

-Well, isn't there a demand for them?

-No, Latino students aren't interested in those courses, they do other things.

-Like what?

-Business and Engineering.

I'm sure many Latinos pursue these interests, but it may be stereotyping to assume that this is the case for all of us.

Because what we are as individuals is based in large part on who we are as a group, we should concern ourselves with our community in more ways than just individual careers and partying. We should demand that classes reflecting the Latino experience in this country be instituted and that the curriculum at this institution achieve real diversity. If our institutions are reflections of our community then we must call upon them to represent our basic interests.

Women, African-Americans, and others have done a great deal to open doors and create opportunities for courses and programs that reflect their experience of the world. It is our responsibility as Latino-Americans to understand that we as a whole must not only open doors for ourselves, but also for our community.

Students protest biased editor

The lead article in the Third World Affairs page (May 1), written by Pratip Dastidar, is the last straw in a string of offensive articles that have appeared on this page since its inception. While some of its authors have restricted themselves to writing factual articles about the Third World, Mr. Dastidar has always exhibited a flair for mudslinging. This article, where he eloquently and invidiously attacks whole sections of the campus community with such great impunity, is a perfect example of his poor journalistic judgement.

The author implies that Third World Students, Indian students in particular, are apathetic to political events (in a host country or otherwise). People who do not shout from rooftops are not necessarily apathetic, and such a conclusion by him reeks of nothing but arrogant self-righteousness. His gripe with the 300-odd graduate student community from India is not new, and it is common knowledge within this student body that Mr. Dastidar is no expert on Third World psyche.

His insinuations about racial prejudices of Whitmore administrators is entirely unfounded. Some of us have been on this campus longer than he has, and we have never noticed any "preferential" treatment of European exchange students. Such blanket accusations in the Third World Affairs page can be misconstrued as reflecting the views of the entire Third World student community.

Authors like him will do better selling their journalistic talents to sensationalist magazines like the National Enquirer. Such slander and misrepresentation in the Third World Affairs page is totally unwarranted. This section of the paper would best serve the interests of the Third World community on campus if authors refrained from venting their vitriolic opinions. If he does insist on expressing such opinions in the Collegian, the editorial/opinion section could cater to just such bile. Since he continues to misuse his position as Editor of the Third World Affairs page, we, as responsible Third World students, demand that he be removed from this position immediately.

May the order of the Pink Slip be bestowed upon him.

We need to fight for our people

There are three predominating ideologies in the Puerto Rican political system: the ethical, the realist and the unethical. Although they seem to be totally juxtaposed, they are all different fragmentations of power within a Darwinistic, colonial, capitalist ideological mentality.

The ethical dreamers are the intellectuals, who live in a futuristic historical context. They advocate justice and ideological abstractions. Yet, they haven't solved the problems of a current reality. For them the present is a secondary issue, only to be opposed by the past.

The coward realists are confused and lack a pillar to support their fear of the past and future history. They are short on backbones and faith. They live one day at a time, with no conception of time. They are caged sheep, yearning for freedom but fearing the unknown. They are existentialists who walk the tight rope of time.

The Unethical assimilators seek equality within an unequal system. they are the forgotten remains of a non-existent past. They are blind to the darkness of reality and opposed to an uncertain future. They are not secure, nor sure, of themselves. thus, they seek a paternalistic Eagle that can carry them in its claws.

The realists tortured and murdered the liberator of my colonial territory. The unethical inquisitors persecute with an iron fist against emancipating ideology. Nonetheless, there are still some that keep the flame from being extinguished. They seek to pressure the enemies of our liberation into forming an annexing mass to carry the historical responsibility of having done everything within their power to end the conflict with the personality of their own people and country, in order to become gracious with an enemy that although uses them, feels a profound depiction against them.

It is time that we seek a collective truth to our condition and overcome the mentality of fear and servitude that chain us to an illusion of life. We must begin to grow and move. We must begin to learn and learn. We must stop crawling and attempt to stand up, and go as far as taking a step. Let us be ourselves. MOVE BY ANY MEANS NECESSARY.

A rifle does not a redneck make

I am a Marine Corps veteran and a member of the NRA. I do not chew tobacco, drink to excess, own a pick-up truck, shoot animals or eat children. Like most of the 2.7 million members of the NRA, I support the preservation of national forests, wetlands and the outdoors in general. As a organization, we recognize the fact that weapons are being used to kill people, but we feel that the way to correct this situation is to eradicate revolving-door justice and unpunished crime, not the Second Amendment to the Constitution, second only to free speech.

What is revolving-door justice? That's when a drug dealer is arrested by a police officer in the morning and is back on the streets dealing poison before the cop gets off duty that night. Revolving-door justice is Patrick Purdy, the AK-47 killer in California who was plea-bargained out of several violent crime convictions before he murdered innocent children. Revolving-door justice is what happens every time a criminal slip through the fingers of the judicial system and walks out onto the streets ready to rape, kill, and steal again because they know they can beat the system.

Politicians benefit from the anti-gun fight because by working to ban weapons they can appear anti-crime without having to offend rich lawyers and judges by restructuring and updating the legal system. They can avoid spending the money to build new prisons in suburban areas where suburbanites don't want them. By avoiding these pitfalls, by substituting change for progress, politicians can get reelected, and the only people hurt are the urban poor, who have to deal with the unpunished animals every day.

All that I ask is that the anti-gunners consider the possibility that just maybe the politicians and the media may have been misleading you. May have been lying and oversimplifying a complicated issue. May have been looking for a short-term reelection sound bite, rather than a long-term solution. They've done it before.

Love is the same for everybody

Day to day I read stories of gay and bisexual prejudices both on campus and throughout the community. For those who find something wrong with such a lifestyle, I have a few questions: Is it wrong to love a person whom you are strongly attracted to? Is it wrong to show public signs of affection? Is it wrong to spend intimate time with the person that you love? I randomly asked these questions to friends without mentioning any sexual preference. Every single person answered no to all three questions. So why does it matter if the person you love is not of the same sex?

Last week I saw two women, presumably lesbian, walking hand in hand by the pond. I had the sudden desire to stand and applaud their courage. I can't imagine such a simple pleasure taken away out of fear of harassment. As a heterosexual ally, I see a group of people who want to love the same way that I do, and who want to show their love the same way that I do. There is nothing wrong with that. I strongly urge those with prejudices to open up your hearts and minds and see that gays and bisexuals are not wrong in wanting to love. As humans, I feel that it is our responsibility to show our support for our gay and bisexual community. Maybe we could all learn a lesson about love and accepting people for who they are.

Bicyclists beware!

Last Friday morning, one of my worst nightmares came true. I was late for class, but not all that concerned because I knew that thanks to my bike I could get to class in just a couple of minutes. I ran out to the bike rack and noticed that someone had painted my bike a different color, overnight. This seemed a little strange so I looked around for a note or something. I looked down on the ground and saw a cable just like the one which had been on my bike. I also saw a padlock just like the one that had been attached to the cable. This padlock was different though, because the steel loop had been cut. This is where my reading of Encyclopedia Brown as a youngster paid off. My bike had not been painted at all. SOMEONE HAD STOLEN MY BIKE!!

This was the rustiest, most unsightly bike in America and over five years old. I can still not quite understand why of all the bikes on campus someone would choose this one.

I am writing this letter to inform my fellow students that this is not an uncommon scenario. I urge fellow bike owners to purchase the best lock available, or they could be next. I know now that any bike on this campus, no matter how miserable, is worth the price of a Kryptonite lock.

Fortunately, I had a security system for my bike. My bike chain had been stretched from excessive use and it had a terrible skip in it. Just when you were in the middle of strong, fluid motion the right pedal would suddenly jerk forward. If not prepared for this, most are thrown off the bike. So, if you see some guy lying in a pool of blood next to a Bull Cruiser mountain bike, tell him that Joe said to get a job, and just keep walking.

The Globe said Campagna and Gallinaro were unavailable last week for interviews.

Dias said, for example, that the three formed East Brook Realty Trust to buy homes because landlords in the area were reluctant to rent property to mentally retarded citizens.

However, the Globe said that in one instance in July 1987, East Brook Realty bought a house in Williamstown from the Center for Humanistic Change, contradicting the assertion that Dias and his associates needed to buy property to avoid hostile landlords.

Furthermore, when the center owned the property, it charged the state roughly $550 a month to cover its mortgage interest and depreciation, according to contract documents. However, when East Brook Realty took over, the rent was increased to $900 a month and now stands at $1,175 a month.

In another move, the Globe said, the center has hired a management consulting and money-lending firm owned by Dias, Campagna and Gallinaro. In state disclosure forms, the center appears to have filed contradictory reports on the status of its management consultant, the newspaper said.

The center has routinely failed to reveal its ties to this firm in the disclosure section of the state's rate-setting forms — though, at the same time, it mentions the firm as a related party in another section concerning loan practices.

The center has paid the management firm about $150,000 to provide training and other administrative services over the last two years.

Judith Cross, the center's lawyer who has also worked as the attorney for the trio's realty trusts, now says it was an error to refer to the firm as a related party in the form and terms the disclosures as mistakes that will need to be corrected.

Since April, 1990, the state has failed to act on a 187-page internal investigative audit by the Executive Office of Human Services that details rampant self-dealing practices involving 60 corporations in the group-home industry. These forms operate largely out of Massachusetts, but also involve 21 other states.

Bruce B. Blaisdell, the head of the state office most involved in supervising the investigative audit, said the head of the Department of Health and Human Services, David Forsberg, has been briefed on the year-old report and has made action a priority. He said that recent staff cutbacks have made it difficult to complete the report quickly.

ARTS & LIVING

Five bucks will buy you a cool night at the Horse

By ANDREW BROADHEAD
Collegian Correspondent

It used to be that five bucks could buy you a decent paperback, buy you shampoo and conditioner, or even get you reasonably drunk in a bar. Five bucks won't get you much nowadays but it will get you in the door at the Iron Horse tonight when the Atlanta-based Ellen James Society opens for local heroes Cordelia's Dad. This is a show not to miss even at double the cover charge.

This is the first time the Ellen James Society have toured up north but their reputation precedes them. In the south, they've been playing two and three thousand seaters. They're still a garage/bar band at heart though, as guitarist/vocalist Seay explains, "A bar is alive. All during our tour, I've been looking forward to the atmosphere of small clubs again. . . the noise, the smell of beer and vomit. The whole rowdiness of playing in bars appeals to me." (at the Iron Horse?)

EJS formed in late 1987 but didn't solidify their line-up until January 1990. Founding member Cooper Seay shares her guitar and vocal duties with Chris McGuire to achingly urgent effect. Their dense mix of scratchy rhythms and acid-influenced jangles ring over the throbbing cadence of Bryan Lilje's bass and Scott Bland's drums.

In reference to their name, they are neither militant feminists nor mutes with tongues removed. They are John Irving fans though and had no objection when their former drummer insisted they name themselves after the feminist group in Irving's World According to Garp. The drummer left, the name stayed. According to Seay, EJS has become more than a name, "Ellen James is the proper noun for the four of us."

EJS are on tour in support of their debut album Reluctantly We. The album is the first release on Indigo Girl Amy Ray's new independent label, Dameon Records. Amy Ray co-produces and appears on several tracks but the LP relies on the band's brooding electric, rather than acoustic impulses.

As one critic has pointed out, there's a seething sexual charge to the album's lyrics. They often follow the stream of conscious thoughts of parting lovers, haunting the listener:

"Your clothes upon the floor/ The smell upon the sheet/ The laughter of your whore/ Then love walks in when you least expect it."

"If you take this, what will we have left, if you take this, would you bring it back in the morning — are you mourning?"

They don't limit themselves to just songs of relationships though. They touch on subjects such as self-fulfillment ("Bring Me") and finding God ("God in Heaven") as well.

Local favorites Cordelia's Dad can only improve an already promising show. When these folk noise merchants take the stage, fun and chaos will erupt. They play traditional arrangements like "Scarborough Fair" and "Will the Circle Be Unbroken?" with Minutemen intensity.

So grab five bucks and come dance and sweat.

Cordelia's Dad and Ellen James Society will play at the Iron Horse tonight at 8:30 p.m. It's $5 at the door.

The Ellen James Society are not a frothing-at-the-mouth feminist group as their moniker, taken from John Irving's novel World According to Garp, would suggest. They will be at the Iron Horse tonight for the low price of $5.

The Vocal Jazz and Afro-American Music Ensemble will present a concert of works by Thelonious Monk tonight at 8 p.m. in Benzanson Recital Hall. Tickets are $5 for the general public; $2.50 for students, children and senior citizens.

Guild presents Christie classic

By DAN JOKELSON
Collegian Correspondent

It has been called the perfect murder mystery. Agatha Christie's Ten Little Indians is a thriller that keeps you clenching your seat, dying for answers and wondering what kind of shadows the person gasping in the seat next to you has in their past.

Ten people have been invited to an island. All of them have been involved in murder trials but have been proven innocent. When they arrive, they discover that their host isn't there, or, as they soon find out, is one of them. Slowly, one by one, they start dying. Their only hope is to stick together to figure it out, but at the same time they have to watch each other very closely. None of them seem to have motive to kill off the other nine, but all are suspicious in their own way. Every action that each character takes gets scrutinized so intensely that the mind is caught in a fascinating entanglement of circles.

"It's a mind-boggler — it kind of jumps at you," says Kristie Tinchger, publicity director of the UMass Theater Guild which is putting on the show in the SUB. This is the first such mystery play done at UMass in years and the seating will be cabaret style, with tables and chairs on platforms of different heights around the SUB. And it is an audience participation type of show. "It's kind of like Rocky Horror without the rice, toast or newspaper throwing." Tincher says, "People should feel free to get into it and let out moans when the person they suspect is the culprit gets murdered."

There are several scenes performed by candlelight, and the whole atmosphere builds in tension.

"It is a well crafted show; people die very evenly," director Craig Doescher says. The eleven cast members have

Jane's Addiction fails to meet expectation in Springfield

By DANIELLE DOWLING

Jane's Addiction
Springfield Civic Center
Friday, May 3

It was too damn short. It was good (mind you, not excellent), but it was too damn short.

Above all, it lacked the intensity that you would come to expect from Jane's Addiction. When they played "Three Days," I expected to be mesmerized by the sights and sounds, instead I was distracted by the fact that guitarist Dave Navarro was too messed up on some kind of drug to play the proper chords.

Maybe I'm jaded, but they did the same cheesy things that all other rock bands do. For example, they waited for the crowd to scream for them before the encore. I didn't expect that from Jane's. Perhaps I expect too much.

Don't get me wrong, there were some good moments in the show. The stage setup was especially cool. It looked like an acid-soaked nativity scene or kooky kind of lawn sale with all sorts of odd baubles and trinkets for sale complete with Christmas lights.

They started off with "Up the Beach," from their second album Nothing's Shocking, which I guess is non-cheesy, since most bands would start off with their number-one hit. "Then She Did. . ." was delivered with poise and grace, although the moment was almost destroyed by the audience clapping in sync and thrusting their lighters in the air. They ended off the set with "Stop," which, as in their performance of "Been Caught Stealin'," had energy but lacked the extra umph needed to make it great or least worth the $20 people shelled out to see them.

I think the encores were the best. First they came out and played "Ocean Size," in which Navarro ripped off an excellent solo and made up for his poor performance all been through two months of rigorous actor training as they attempt a new kind of Guild show: no "flash" like the traditional Guild musicals. The actors are "working to fill the script, not show it," Tincher says.

Doescher has pushed them to fill the many seemingly inscrutable riddles in the script with their own solutions based on their own impulses. The result is a production with eleven strong actors whose personal commitment to the show and each other allows them to play freely off of each other, with discoveries happening every night of rehearsals.

"It is living on the edge," remarks Tom Berry who is Judge Wargrave in the mystery and a veteran principle Guild actor. The cast has created many ways of stirring up the suspense and terrifying each other, and it should be a "killer show."

Ten Little Indians will be performed tonight, tomorrow night and Wednesday night at 8 p.m. at the Student Union Ballroom. Tickets are $5 for the general public and $3 for Five-College students.

night. Then they jammed out. Navarro, bassist Eric Avery and drummer Steven Perkins pounded away on boxes while Farrell crooned along. It's was the most engrossing and memorable part of the night, but when I'm more blown away by the live performance of Cop Shoot Cop than by Jane's Addiction, I'm left to wonder.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Trying to force your opinions on others will backfire. Shy away from anything unconventional for a while. Home is a very pleasant place to be right now. Be more considerate of loved ones.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): It may be necessary to drive long distances today. Make certain you have everything you need! Pay more attention to your personal appearance. Replace bad habits with healthy ones.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): A joint effort to please higher-ups could fall short of the mark today. Concentrate on solo projects. Your mate or partner is a tower of strength. Be equally supportive. Avoid issuing ultimatums.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Hidden factors may hinder some of your efforts. You are irritated by those who prefer discussion to action. Learn to play the waiting game. Sign legal documents only after checking with experts.

LEO (July 23-Aug 22): Experts' advice will accelerate your career progress. Embrace the great outdoors with open arms. Continue to work on projects already under way. Improve communication with overseas contact.

VIRGO (Aug 23-Sept 22): A persuasive friend may try to talk you into something. Think twice! Platonic relationships may be more fulfilling than romantic ones now. Your reputation for discretion is a great asset.

LIBRA (Sept 23-Oct 22): The emphasis now is on saying the right thing at the right time. Control a tendency to fly off the handle when opposed. A crisis can be averted through your calm intervention.

SCORPIO (Oct 23-Nov 21): An authority figure may challenge you today. Stay on your toes! Look for ways to expand your business base without violating budget restrictions. Keep personal spending to a minimum.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov 22-Dec 21): A great day for negotiating contracts and finding new talent. Those in real estate or interior decorating can make record financial gains. Be optimistic about a relationship.

CAPRICORN (Dec 22-Jan 19): Waste and extravagance could put a business in the red. Enlist family members' cooperation before revising a budget. You can learn a lot from an older person's experiences.

AQUARIUS (Jan 20-Feb 18): Be flexible. Keep an open mind. Benefit from the propositions that help you to build up a firmer basis for family life and understanding. Avoid demanding more than you are willing to give.

PISCES (Feb 19-March 20): Keep your feet planted on the ground when it comes to financial issues. An unexpected problem could catch you off-guard. Diplomacy helps you handle it gracefully. Romance will delight you.

UMass' best opportunity to score came in the sixth inning. Third baseman Steve Corradi led off the inning with a double, and moved to third on a sacrifice bunt by shortstop Glenn DiSarcina. Hill then called on right-hander Jim Kohl to end the threat.

Bright greeted Kohl with a single to third base, but the ball was hit so sharply that Corradi had to hold at third. Kohl then got out of the inning by inducing Dana to hit into a doubleplay.

Graham went the entire seven innings, striking out six and allowing only five hits and no walks.

"Rich Graham pitched a great game," UMass head coach Mike Stone observed. "Too bad he didn't have more runs."

The second game was not nearly as close. Rutgers won the game 7-2 on the strength of a solid pitching performance by right-hander David Hoehler and numerous miscues by the UMass defense.

Rutgers took a 2-0 lead in the first inning against UMass left-hander Scott Meaney. Consecutive one-out singles by second baseman Chris McAllnain, right fielder Angel Echevarria and Imperial resulted in the first Rutgers run. An error by Corradi allowed Echevarria to score the second run.

A throwing error by DiSarcina allowed designated hitter Kevin James to reach base with one out in the second. After a single by Cann and a pop-up by McAllnain, James scored the second unearned run of the game on a single by Echevarria to give Rutgers a 3-0 lead.

Right-hander Jim Telgheder then came in to replace Meaney. Telgheder retired Imperial on a fly ball to end the inning.

Telgheder hit Marchee with a close pitch leading off the inning. After a lineout and a strikeout, Telgheder also hit Higgins with a pitch putting runners on first and second. James singled to drive in Marchee and Cann followed with a single to drive in Higgins.

UMass scored an unearned run off David Hoehler in the fifth inning. Dana reached first base on a throwing error from Winchock. He stole second base in between the strikeouts of DiSarcina and Carelli and was delivered home on a single by left fielder Dave Edwards.

Lefty Ron Villone took the mound for UMass in the top of the seventh. He hit Imperial and walked Marchee to start the inning. First baseman Steve Micheals moved the runners to second and third with a sacrifice bunt. Both runners scored on an error by Carelli to give Rutgers a 7-1 lead.

The Minutemen scored a run in the bottom of the seventh. Bright led off the inning with a double. He moved to third on a sacrifice fly by Dana and scored on a single by Carelli.

faceoff possession was not easily won. SU took 14-of-4 draws.

SU's Jerry DeLorenzo looked confident in goal throughout the game, but UMass' Ted Kellerman was left hanging by his defense early in the game and allowed three quick goals in the first quarter. DeLorenzo finished with 15 saves and Kellerman had 12 for the game.

Syracuse's Dom Fin assisted Matt Riter for the first goal and set the tone for the game. Marachek fed to Jamie Archer then scored unassisted one minute later, still unanswered by the UMass attack.

The midfielder's and attackmen's feeds connected but the ball was shot wide or was snuffed by DeLorenzo.

"We were shooting, we were just missing the corners," Millon said. "That's just the breaks."

Millon scored unassisted with six minutes to play in the first checking the score at 3-1, Syracuse.

Fin scored unassisted and was soon followed by Pat McCabe's feed to Mike Doyle. But it was UMass who would end the scoring when Jim McAleavey fed to Millon to end the first quarter at 5-2, Syracuse.

"We just weren't ball conscious," McAleavey said. "We were unoranized on offense . . . we took to long to set up."

Marachek's stick was checked and found to be illegal by the officials in between the quarters. He was subsequently penalized for the first three minutes of the second quarter because the stick's head was narrower than regulation.

Syracuse scored on 2-of-6 man-up opportunities while UMass went 1-for-4.

UMass' was unable to capitalize in those three minutes, but scored seven seconds after the penalty expired while man-down on a Millon-McAleavey combination.

Tom Gilmartin, who had been taking SU's faceoffs, scored unassisted at 9:29 to put the score at 6-3. Marachek's new stick did not prevent him from scoring unassisted at 5:02.

Mario Guaglianone netted one for UMass unassisted during man-down for a 4-8 score.

Gilmartin scored again unassisted soon followed by Marachek's feed to Paul Cannon which ended the scoring at 9-4 for the half.

Gilmartin's stick was checked and also found to be illegal, so again the Gorillas would be man-up for three minutes into a quarter. Gilmartin's head was also too narrow.

Throughout the game Syracuse was able to clear the ball effectively whereas UMass' clears were sloppy.

UMass came out storming in the second half, scoring two goals in two minutes. McAleavey fed to Millon and Hugh O'Callaghan scored unassisted, his ninth goal of the season.

SU's Rickey Cramer answered unassisted and was not to be heard from for the remainder of the game.

The UMass longstick defense of Rick Mullins, Gary Wood, Jim Panetta and O'Callaghan was able to hold the Orangemen scoreless for eight minutes in the third quarter.

"We definately had some lulls," Simmons said.

Marachek netted the ball unassisted with 1:21 to play, ending the scoring at 11-6 for the quarter.

Fin fed to Marachek 15 seconds into the fourth and again the Orangemen were stifled for seven minutes.

Jim Kushner scored unassisted twice, within a three-minute span and was later followed by a McAleavey-Guaglianone combination to top the Gorillas' rally at 12-9, Syracuse.

John Barr fed to Riter to wrap-up the scoring at 13-9.

Rutgers Knights lance Minutemen 2-1, 7-2

By KEITH BENNETT
Collegian Correspondent

The Rutgers baseball team came to Amherst Saturday needing to win at least one game in the doubleheader to gain a berth in the Atlantic 10 Tournament. The Scarlet Knights did themselves one better by taking both games from the Minutemen.

The two wins enabled Rutgers to take the A-10 East title and dropped the Minutemen to second place.

"We wanted to come in first," Rutgers coach Fred Hill said. "We came here with the intention of winning both games."

Graham started off strong with two strikeouts in the first inning. Schneider was equally impressive, sitting down the Minutemen in order during his half of the first.

The runs from both teams came in the second inning.

Third baseman Jason Imperial led off the inning with a double off of Graham. Left fielder Jay Marchee moved Imperial to third with a sacrifice bunt and first baseman Tim Roth brought him home with an RBI single.

A single by shortstop Mike Winchock put runners on first and second with one out. After Graham retired catcher Mike Higgins with a grounder, a wild pitch allowed Roth to score the second run for Rutgers. Center fielder James Cann flied out to end the inning.

In almost a carbon-copy of the top half of the inning, right fielder Brian Bright led off the second inning against Schneider with a double. He was moved to third on a sacrifice bunt by catcher Derek Dana and scored on a double by second baseman John Carelli to bring the Minutemen within one at 2-1.

A single by left fielder Justin Howard put runners on first and third with one out. Schneider then clamped down on UMass. After Schneider struck out designated hitter Andy Pelis, first baseman Jay Dodig grounded out to end the inning.

Graham gave up only two singles over the last five innings, but the Minutemen were unable to score any more runs despite putting runners in scoring position in the third, fourth, sixth and seventh innings.

Orangemen put squeeze on Gorillas

By ADRIEN MATT
Collegian Staff

Getting the ball to hit the back of the net is easier some days than others.

For the University of Massachusetts lacrosse team, Saturday was one of those days. The Syracuse Orangemen defeated the Gorillas 13-9 in the Stadium.

"We may have won, but we didn't do it with style," said SU coach Roy Simmons Jr. "It wasn't a convincing win."

"They played better in the first half and we played better in the second," said UMass coach Ted Garber. He said he was pleased with the way the team played, adding, "I always say that athletics reveals character, not builds it, and these kids have a lot of character."

UMass' Mark Millon and SU's Tom Marachek tied for a game-high four goals, Marachek also contributed two assists for a game-high seven points.

"You just can't take any team lightly," Marachek said of the competition. "They hit really hard and played well."

Romine steps in for Burks, hits grand slam in Chicago

By JOE MOOSHIL
Associated Press

CHICAGO — Kevin Romine is getting pretty good at hitting with the bases loaded all of a sudden.

After entering the season 0-for-15 lifetime with the sacks full, Romine has two hits in his last tow at-bats with the bases loaded. On Sunday, he even hit a grand slam to lead the Boston Red Sox to a 9-1 victory and a three-game sweep over the slumping Chicago White Sox.

Romine doesn't mind coming off the bench either.

"That's my role, that's what I'm here to do," said Romine, who make his first start of the season to give struggling Ellis Burks a rest. "Ellis needed a day off and whenever a guy needs a rest, I'll be ready."

Romine's slam, his fist in the major leagues, came in the second inning and put the first-place Red Sox in position for the sweep. It was his first homer of the season, the fifth of his career and first away from Fenway Park.

"This was fun, it was a new experience for me," said Romine, who was make aware a week ago Saturday that he had been 0-for-15 in his career with the bases loaded before getting a pinch, two-run single against Kansas City.

"Now I'm 2-for-2," said Romine, whose blow helped Matt Young (1-1) gain his first victory for the Red Sox. The slam come after Carlos Quintana and Luis Rivera singled and Jody Reed walked.

Young picked up his first win for the Red Sox after signing as a free agent last December. He had a three-hit shutout going until the White Sox broke a string of 22 scoreless innings with a run in the sixth. Young gave up seven hits in seven innings before Dennis Lamp finished.

The Red Sox, who have won three straight, scored and unearned run in the first on an error and a double by Mike Marshall. They added two more in the fourth on single by Tony Pena and Rivera, an erro and a sacrifice fly by Reed.

The loss was the fifth straight for the White Sox.

Singles by Quintana and Pena led to two more runs in the sixth.

Notes: Frank Thomas, nursing a stiff shoulder, was the DH and Cory Snyder played first base in his place. Snyder booted Reed's ground ball for an error in the first inning that resulted in an unearned run .

Craig Grebeck started at shortstop for the White Sox in place of Ozzie Guillen who was given a rest . . .

The last time the Red Sox swept the White Sox in three games in Chicago was in August of 1968.

Young was 0-4 against the White Sox while at Seattle last year and 3-10 in his career.

"It's hard to do after nine years," said Young of making changes that included swing out his leg and keeping his back straight. "I felt good the last two outings and I've made quality pitches."

Manager Joe Morgan said Young pitched well, "but we hadn't been getting him any runs. He has kept us in games and that's all you can ask."

What about Romine now?

"He'll sit." Morgan said.

Young said he had an effective slider and had the batters hitting down on it. The White Sox hit into five double plays, four while Young was in the game. "Young has a good arm and did a great job," White Sox Manager Jeff Torborg said. "The Red Sox came here and beat the dickens out of us. You can't make a mistake against them. If you do, they put big numbers on the board. Hopefully we can learn from adversity, we've had a lot of it."

State schools asked to use tuition money for aid

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

The Board of Regents of Higher Education decided Thursday to ask state colleges and universities to set aside some of their tuition money for financial aid.

Under the amended tuition policy, campuses will be allowed to divert some of their tuition money to financial aid, but only if other financial aid sources are inadequate.

Under the new plan, fees will be included in tuition. Presently, campuses set and keep a percentage of their tuition.

The decision does not increase the amount of money students pay because they have been paying tuition disguised as fees for the past few years, said Terry Zoulas, spokesman for the Board.

The Board also approved a tuition retention policy that will force the Governor and the Legislature to give tuition money back to the campus that collects it.

The money that each campus gets back will be a portion of the tuition students pay each semester. According to Zoulas, this will total approximately $100 million for the year.

The Legislature and Gov. Weld must approve the tuition retention policy, which Weld is believed to support.

Weld recently proposed an additional $53.6 million cut for public higher education for fiscal year 1992, bringing the total proposed cut in funding for next year to $145.6 million.

Weld has proposed spending about $440 million — a $146 million decrease from the current year — for higher education in fiscal year 1992, which begins July 1.

Weld's most recent proposal would save $22.8 million by eliminating state support for the UMass Medical Center in Worcester. He said UMass could make up for this loss by using a $100 million trust fund.

Weld also proposed that the state scholarship fund be cut from $57 million to $40 million.

Of that $40 million, Weld proposes that $25 million be converted to loans. Weld initially wanted to convert all scholarships to loans.

When the Board meets again June 6, it will discuss tuition increases for the fall semester. The Board postponed any decision on tuition increases last week because the House Ways and Means Committee has not yet released its version of the 1992 budget.

Yesterday, University Provost Richard O'Brien sent a telegram to Representative Thomas Finneran, Chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, asking them to stop the budget cuts on higher education.

The telegram read as follows:

"Weld budget continues to place disproportionate budget cut burden on public higher education with a 25 percent reduction this year following three years of brutal cuts. STOP. Extreme damage would be done to careers of 180,000 current students statewide, and many more in years ahead. STOP. Governor may accept destruction of public higher education but we look to you to reduce cuts so that we take our fair share. STOP. Universities take decades to build but can be destroyed in few years. STOP. Help us!"

The House Ways and Means Committee should be ready to announce its proposed budget for fiscal year 1992 sometime next week, Zoulas said.

The Legislature is believed to be seeking an additional cut of $100 million.

O'Brien is scheduled to meet with advisors Wednesday to discuss which departments will be cut.

One student to run in recognized Student Trustee election

By ALEX DERING
Collegian Staff

There is one candidate in the administration-recognized Student Trustee election scheduled for May 9.

Jennifer Wood, a sophomore senator from Leach, is running for the position, which acts as the official liaison between the Student Government and the Board of Trustees.

Wood has worked on several "get out the vote" drives, including the drive to defeat Citizen's for Limited Taxation, the Amherst Town Meeting elections and Jim Collins' Congressional campaign.

Wood was a coordinator of last spring's MASSPirg Hunger Project, had a seat on their board of directors until this March, and is the UMass chapter chairperson.

Along with several other students, Wood was elected a member of the Amherst Town Meeting in the last election.

Wood said she is running for the office of Trustee because of the lack of organization in student government.

"We need an organizing perspective in government," she said. "And I don't see it coming from the student government."

In addition to the lack of organization, Wood said she is motivated to run for trustee because ". . .it's hard to come to this school, make friends, and have them leave because they can't afford it anymore."

Wood said she plans to focus on getting information distributed and on getting the student body more organized through grassroots campaigning.

"We need to start going to people, to the newspapers, writing about our personal experiences," Wood said.

"We need to shift away from facts and figures. Everyone knows them at this point. They don't have a strong effect anymore. People have to realize that we're not just student ID numbers."

Wood called higher education "the key to the future. "[Students] will be staying in the state for the most part, unless the state runs us off."

The election comes one month after a previous election for the same office which was not recognized by the administration because it contravened an administrative decision to suspend elections as set forth in a letter sent to the university community on Feb. 11.

In the Feb. 11 letter, the administration, in response to requests by student leaders, took control of the student government, which the student leaders felt had become unmanageable.

The administration also formed the Commission on Undergraduate Student Governance, a group of students and administrators charged with devising a new government structure.

The administration also stated in that letter:

"Elections of all SGA Officers, except the Student Trustee position, will be postponed until September. At that time elections will be held for whatever offices are specified in the new governance structure [as devised by the Commission on Undergraduate Student Governance].

"The election for the Student Trustee will be held in May in accordance with the laws establishing this position."

The result of that commission's work will be voted on in a referendum question on May 9. A "yes" vote would support replacing the old form of student government with the structure devised by the Commission on Undergraduate Student Governance.

A "no" vote will keep the old form of government in place.

The Feb. 11 letter came under immediate criticism by the Student Government Association, and a Student President/Student Trustee election was held April 9, despite administrative refusal to recognize those elections.

Wood did not run in the April 9 election because she had planned to serve as campaign manager for another candidate, Manny Bento.

Bento eventually decided not to run for personal reasons, according to Wood.

By the time Bento informed Wood of his decision not to run, it was too late for Wood to run in those elections.

According to Ashoke Ganguli, Director of Auxiliary Services, voting will take place in the dining commons "just like it has for the last 20 years."

Northeast and Sylvan residents may vote at the Worcester Dining Commons. Orchard Hill or Central residents may vote at the Franklin Dining Commons. Southwest-North residents may vote at the Hampshire Dining Commons. Southwest-South residents may vote at the Berkshire Dining Commons. Students living in Greek Housing may vote at the Newman Center. Commuter Students may vote at the Hatch.

Storms hamper relief effort in Bangladesh

Rough weather may cause cyclone death toll to rise sharply

DHAKA, Bangladesh (AP) — With time running out for sick and starving survivors in cyclone-ravaged lowlands, thunderstorms and rough weather yesterday hampered relief efforts and escalated fears the death toll could rise sharply.

"The critical period has started. Famished men, injured men can only survive for four to five days under the circumstances," said Dr. Mohammad Musa of CARE International, an aid group.

Official reports say more than 125,000 people have perished following last Tuesday's cyclone that swamped coastal areas with huge waves and winds up to 145 mph. An estimated 10 million people were left homeless by the cyclone, one of the worst to hit Bangladesh this century.

The Red Crescent, the Islamic equivalent of the Red Cross, predicted the death toll would probably reach 200,000 from starvation and diseases spread by water fouled by rotting animal carcasses and sewage. Newspaper reports said the final toll could hit 500,000 which would exceed the aftermath of a 1970 cyclone that hit the nation on the northern coast of the Bay of Bengal.

"We don't see how they can avoid one of the biggest cholera epidemics in the century," said John Mohrbacher, a spokesman for CARE in New York.

The thunderstorms and rough seas yesterday delayed two rivercraft and four trucks carrying supplies to the east coast. CARE reported gusty winds and rain on Sunday hampered Bangladesh's fleet of 17 helicopters and a few fixed wind airplanes on missions to airdrop supplies.

There were no immediate reports of injuries or damage from the thunderstorms, which hit as hundreds of thousands of people huddled on spits of land isolated by floodwaters.

Few trucks could travel southward because the roads were flooded, officials said.

"At this time of year we do have thunderstorms capable of inflicting damage. They are localized but they assume importance now because even a low or medium-velocity storm can cause damage and psychological trauma," a Weather Bureau official said, speaking on conditions of anonymity.

Communications with the area was nearly wiped out by the cyclone and all reports were delayed.

Weather forecasters in Dhaka on Sunday had predicted winds of up to 70 mph could lash Bangladesh, but the wind alert for sea craft was lifted early today. Warnings remained in effect for riverboats, which are vulnerable to tidal surges.

Meanwhile there were reports yesterday of problems plaguing relief efforts and acts of desperation by survivors.

Grad student volunteers to help people with AIDS

Local program gives AIDS victims support

By CHRIS MUTHER
Collegian Staff

For one University of Massachusetts student, there is a relief from the suffering of AIDS: caring.

Eric Oches, 26, a graduate student in the geology department, has been volunteering his time and energy for the past two years to help people with AIDS in the Pioneer Valley.

Through a program sponsored by the Visiting Nurse Association of the Pioneer Valley, Oches has supported and befriended two people with AIDS.

"The experience of being a volunteer is unique," he said. "You develop a good relationship with someone and in the process realize AIDS isn't such a mystical thing."

Oches said his interest in volunteering grew out of a concern with the lack of effort he saw to help people with AIDS.

"At the start of the epidemic, it was very frustrating because no one really knew anything about the disease and people were reluctant to help," he said.

Training to become a support volunteer for the program consists of a weekend training session and two evenings, for a total of 30 hours, and working on a one-to-one basis with someone who is HIV positive.

Oches said a main theme of the training is dealing with death. Much of the work the volunteer does, besides helping with activities like cooking and cleaning, is helping the patient prepare for death in advanced stages of the disease.

"It makes death a less fearful thing," he said. "It is interesting to watch patients work toward the end. They try to settle differences to avoid dying with personal business left unfinished."

Reed Ide, AIDS support volunteer manager at the VNA program since 1986, said the program provides a variety of assistance — including nurses, volunteers, members of the clergy and psychiatrists — to people who are HIV infected or have AIDS.

Ide said the volunteers help keep the quality of life high for the patients.

"They're essentially there to provide a lot of different kinds of support," he said. "They help to alleviate isolation — to help get them out to a movie or to the mall."

Another important function of the volunteer, he said, is to report changes in the health of the patient and watch for signs that may help nurses detect early illnesses.

Ide said there are currently 22 volunteers working in the program. Although many volunteers are scattered throughout the Valley, he said the greatest concentration of AIDS cases and volunteers are in the Springfield area.

There is also an extensive network set up to aid volunteers who may become overwhelmed or distraught by the deaths of patients. He said there are regular support groups for volunteers with a trained facilitator as well as one-to-one meetings between himself and volunteers.

"It's a hard job," he said. "You're watching a lot of people die in the middle of their lives, in some cases the beginning of their lives."

Of the 82 AIDS patients the VNA currently looks after, more than 50 percent are women, he said. This percentage has been rising over the past three years.

"The epidemic has only been around for 10 years," he said. "We don't know how it moves through the population, but now we're seeing it move beyond the main risk groups."

Over all, Ide said the number of AIDS cases in the Valley has been steadily increasing over the past four years, with the highest numbers in the gay community.

"I'm very aware of denial in the gay community," he said. "It's especially frightening with younger gay men. Many of them think that AIDS was an 80s thing and that since it's the 90s they won't be affected. Many say they only practice safe sex 'most of the time.'"

Ide also said that local college campuses are a place of potential risk for the transmission of AIDS.

"In college men and women do a lot of sexual experimentation, with each other and with the same sex," he said. "Alcohol also goes hand-in-hand with this, and when alcohol is involved, responsible sexual decisions go out the door."

The VNA is currently seeking support volunteers in the area or donations to assist patients in payment for care. For more information call the VNA at 781-5070.

New SGA structure to be discussed

Members of the Commission on Student Governance will hold an open forum to discus the new structure of student government today from 4 p.m to 6 p.m. in the Cape Cod Lounge.

Natasha Diephuis, student government president, and Dan Chesnicka, former speaker of the senate, will present the work of the Commission at the forum.

On Thursday's Student Trustee election ballot, the Commission's plan will be presented as a referendum question. The vote will be either yes or no: yes for the new structure or no for the current Senate structure.

Last Wednesday, in a unanimous vote with four abstentions, the SGA withdrew all recognition of the Commission.

"The Commission has no authority [from the SGA Senate] to alter its constitution, by-laws, or structure," said Senator Kevin Newnan.

Newnan said the SGA will take the Commission's work into account next semester when it will draw up plans to restructure itself.

Kennedy scandal raises new issues of journalistic ethics

A woman wakes up after an evening of hell. She pulls her blanket up around her and closes her eyes. Her worst nightmare has been realized and now she has to live with its torrid memory.

Reluctantly, she pulls herself out of bed to take a hot shower. Despite the warm water and quiet solace of the shower, her muscles remain tense, her nerves still in knots.

Her close friend who stayed with her overnight gently knocks on the door as she dries herself off. "Ann, do you want some breakfast? I kinda thought blueberry pancakes would be good. What do you think?" she asks.

Ann wraps herself in a big terrycloth robe and comes out. "Yeah, I'm really hungry," she says softly. "That sounds wonderful. . .and maybe some coffee?"

"I'll make it really strong," her friend Lucy responds.

Lucy softly touches Ann's shoulder. "How are you doing? I know that's a really stupid question, but do you, I mean, are you, do you feel any better?" she asks.

"I'm still numb," Ann answers. "I just, I just don't know. I haven't even gotten angry yet."

Lucy nods and goes to the kitchen to fix breakfast while Ann returns to her small, cozy bedroom. She pulls on a pair of fluffy white socks and heads toward the front door to grab her newspaper, thinking that reading the news would ease her mind, or at least take her mind off of last night.

A cold, damp breeze blows in through the crack of the door as she reaches down to grab the paper bound in a thick blue rubber band. Drawing her robe a little tighter, securing the tie a little bit more, she plods into the kitchen to grab a mug of coffee.

As she pulls off the rubber band, there it is staring her in the face: "LOCAL WOMAN RAPED IN MALL PARKING LOT"

She gasps as she reads the story:

"A 25-year-old Melford woman was allegedly attacked at knifepoint and raped in the Westford shopping mall at 11:09 p.m. last night.

Meredith O'Brien

Ann Derryl, a luxury store clerk, reportedly told police that Dan Miller, an acquaintance of hers, saw her shopping at the mall, engaged her in conversation and then attacked her in the parking lot after he walked her out to her car."

Ann crumples the paper and throws it to the ground.

"What? What happened?" Lucy asks. Looking at the paper on the ground, Lucy picks it up and glances at the front page.

"Oh God," she mutters. "I don't know what to say."

"Obviously," Ann says, clenching her fists with her voice cracking, "everything's already been said."

In the wake of the release of the woman's name who was allegedly raped in Palm Beach by a member of the Kennedy clan, the issue of putting the name of a rape victim in a news story or broadcast has been tearing apart newsrooms across the country.

Keeping in mind that the name of the rape victim is a matter of public record, to which the press and public have full access (despite what the Florida legal system would have you believe), the point at issue is whether or not it is ethical to release the name of the woman who was raped.

The men accused of rape claim it is only fair that the name of their accusers be made public like theirs. They assert they are innocent until proven guilty and that their reputations are severely maligned by the mere charge of rape.

Women's groups are also torn on the issue. One group staunchly believes that releasing the names of rape victims only further victimizes women by putting them up for public scrutiny in an atmosphere where the general public still believes that women ask to be raped.

The other sector believes the only way to shake the stigma of rape is make it public like any other crime. By releasing the woman's name, the rape will be legitimized because the public will have to come to terms with the real people, the real names, who are victimized by rape. In making her name public, the stigmatization, the burden of having to carry this horrible secret will be gone.

So the question remains, to name or not to name?

Third World coverage praised

Congratulations to the Collegian for yet another semester of incisive analysis and reporting in the Third World Affairs page. During the recent war, at a time when the most advanced information and communications network in the world was engaged in the most heinous Orwellian mind control, the Third World Affairs page was one of the only sources of alternative interpretations.

The previous issue of the page brought issues home and dealt with some of the contradictions and conflicts present right here on this campus in its publications and its various communities. We condemn recent attempts to undermine true representation of opinion on the page.

We would also like to elaborate on some attitudes and tendencies present among some of the Indian community, which were briefly mentioned in the editorial, "Let us give a grand salute to mediocrity" (May 1, 1991).

As part of the India Night program on April 28, some UMass students had written and produced a play which depicted India's history and culture. It included scenes which showed the British imperialists whipping Indians on stage, and Indians being taken as indentured laborers to far off lands. However, the play met with stiff resistance from several members of the Indian community, and only vehement insistence of the part of some ensured that the play went through in its original form. We find it very saddening that some citizens of a proud Third World country fear the very thought of putting on an event which brings out intellectual and political themes underlying its history.

Other members of our community have been angered at what they perceive as mudslinging and slander by the staff of the page. They fail to realize that the page was never meant to be an overarching spokesperson for the activities and attitudes of the Third World community on campus, but was created to provide a critical forum for perspectives which would challenge the thinking of both the mainstream and the minority communities on this campus.

The Indian community is one of the largest Third World communities on campus, but, as the editorial points out, its participation in campus activities has been far from proportionate. The Collegian, through this page, has raised some very controversial issues about attitudes which some Third World communities have tried to push under the rug.

Posting stuff on trees is harmful

Spring is such a beautiful time of the year. The flowers bloom, the trees blossom, the birds sing, and people staple posters to trees. What!?

I was walking home from the D.C., when I first spotted them.

A poster stapled to a maple tree on my left and another poster on the elm to my right. How could anyone be so stupid to actually staple anything to a living tree?

Some of you readers out there are probably thinking, "What's so bad about that?" You probably don't realize that it is against the law to staple things to living trees, punishable through fines. Besides the legal aspect, it isn't too healthy for the tree.

I realize (or rather hope) that the people who did the stapling were probably just ignorant of the law rather than blatantly ignoring it, but I would have hoped that they would have the common sense to not staple a tree. After all, would you staple a poster on your arm?

That's an apology?

What is an apology? According to Webster's, an apology can be "a formal justification, an admission of error or discourtesy accompanied by an expression of regret, or a poor substitute." I must say that what goes for an apology at UMass as far as some fraternities are concerned can only be considered a poor substitute.

Take, for example, the letter from Pike in the May 2 edition of the Collegian. After briefly mentioning that the letter was apologizing for the entire fraternity, the writer enumerated the various community services in which the fraternity had participated. What happened to the apology part of the letter? Merely mentioning the word apology does not license or excuse a full blown resume of all the other things the fraternity does. Especially since none of those activities involved any kind of involvement in issues regarding women, violence against women, respect for women, etc.

Pike is not the only fraternity which displays flippant behavior about such "isolated incidents" as the one experienced by a woman who was subjected to verbal obscenities as she walked by the frat house. The only reason such incidents are isolated is because very few women publicize them, not because they happen infrequently. However, Pike's apology typifies the attitude shared by many frats that such behavior is quite acceptable, or at least not important enough to change. And I happen to think that an apology which makes no effort towards change is one poor substitute for an apology.

WOMEN'S ISSUES

Martial arts school teaches women strength

By LISA VESHECCO
Collegian Correspondent

Women resist various forms of abuse that occur against themselves and children all the time, yet they do not hear about those who resist, adapt, survive and succeed, says a local martial arts artist.

While many women believe the myth that "they must defend themselves against the someone in the dark" the reality of it is that "it is more common for women to defend themselves against people they know," said Janet Aalfs, head instructor for Valley Women's Martial Arts, Inc., an Easthampton-based self-defense school.

Aalfs said the training offered at the center includes the "element of success," which includes women and children perceiving themselves as successful — by using visualization techniques — rather than internalizing the victim image pervasive in a violent culture.

According to Aalfs, most of the women who have come to train at the center have experienced some degree of abuse in their lives. Training in the martial arts, she added, integrates the physical, mental and spiritual aspects of oneself allowing for one to become a whole person.

Aalfs said that although some men get attacked it is mainly men who do the attacking and that women and children must deal with the fear.

VWMA instructs two styles of martial arts and offers a general self defense class for women and one for girls and boys between the ages of seven and 14. The styles involved include Shuri Rye, an Okinawan style karate, and Arnis, a Filipino form of stick fighting. Aalfs said the Arnis works well because its base provides a good complement to the Shuri Rye style.

The Valley Women's Martial Arts celebrates its tradition involving four generations of women teaching women. Wendi Dragonfire, the school's founder, established the VWMA in 1977. The school, which originally served women in Springfield, Greenfield and Northampton, now serves women throughout Western Massachusetts.

Aalfs said the school supports each woman as she comes to the choice of finding the power that exists inside.

Because the process of training brings women to this place of power, she said, "It's important to be able to support that power in a place that is going to nurture it instead of squelching it." She added the work that is done at the school works against the status quo that seeks to keep women in "their place."

Aalfs, herself a second-degree black belt, began training in 1978 after viewing Dragonfire in a demonstration at a Unitarian church. Aalfs says she responded to the "strength and attitude" that Dragonfire possessed as a martial artist.

Speaking of her own experience, Aalfs says her training has brought her out of a place of silence and fear. Once operating under deeply engrained societal ideas of private spheres for women Aalfs says her training has given her, "A sense of how far I extend." She asserts, "I do have an effect on the world," and she said, training has given her, "A sense of being a person in the world."

Martial Arts training develops one's resources in general, says Aalfs. "The more you work with different forms of the art the stronger you become on many levels." The forms one learns in martial arts training is a series of animal movements. According to Aalfs, finding one's voice and developing it is an integral part of training. "The voice, states Aalfs, is a physical thing, an expression of spirit."

Third year student Celeste Hart says, "The one thing that speaks most to me of the effects of training in my life is the awareness of not being afraid."

"My dreams have changed," she said, adding that she once saw herself "as slow as molasses" in her dreams. Now, she said, "I see myself applying the techniques of my training, I have the power to run fast."

Hart also said she appreciates the fact that women at the school are taught to care for themselves.

"I think there is something special about a feminist school," she said. "Although we try to appreciate the art. . .we make room for feminist values." She said that at the school she has learned a responsibility to self, to take care of self, and has the courage to "do what we need for ourselves."

Help sought for shelter

By MICHAEL MANGIARACINA
Collegian Correspondent

A Northampton-based battered women's center is looking for a new office while it tries to cope with recent cuts in state funding.

Necessities/Necesidades has faced a $19,000 cut in state funding in the last 18 months and will not receive an increase in funding during the upcoming year, Cathie LeBanc, the center's administrative coordinator, said.

As a result, she said, the position of community education coordinator has been eliminated.

This comes at a time when the center will have to leave the house it has occupied for the past two years, said Elizabeth Catlin, a volunteer at the center. The house was donated to the center by a community member who will be returning from a sabbatical at the end of the month.

LeBanc said that another location has not yet been found and was uncertain about how the center will weather the strain of having to pay rent again.

"We're doing as well as can be expected," she said, citing community support for the center since its founding in 1977.

Necessities/Necesidades receives 21 percent of its budget from community donations through fundraisers such as concerts, the recent "Move-a-thon/Do-a-thon," and last fall's "Hair-a-thon," in Amherst, LeBanc said, adding that the center also relies on the support of grants from federal governments, such as a block grant from the Department of Housing and Urban Development in conjunction with the city of Northampton, local governments, such as the town of Amherst, and counties and local charities, such as the United Way, to help meet expenses.

Although currently employing four full-time and two part-time staff members, the center owes its survival to its approximately 50-60 volunteers who work throughout the center, said LeBanc, adding that approximately 85 percent of the volunteer staff are students or recent graduates. The departure of these students will leave the center with a loss of personnel during the summer months, she said.

The center, which is open Monday through Friday, 9 a.m.- 5 p.m., provides a 24 hour telephone hotline and several support programs, including both group and individual counseling.

The center also operates a shelter for battered women, Catlin said.

Women interested in volunteering for Necessities/Necesidades are encouraged to call Sandy Goodman at 586-1125.

Tradeswomen group formed

By DANIEL J. LYONS
Collegian Correspondent

For many women in traditionally male-dominated occupations, such as plumbers and electricians, the work world can be difficult without the support of their co-workers or other women. With this in mind, a special support network was formed for these women.

The Western Massachusetts Women in the Trades, an organization formed eight years ago, helps women cope with everyday problems in the workplace. According to Sadie Stull, co-director of the 150-member organization, it consists mainly of an informal mailing list of women in the trades, advocates and those women who may be interested in enter7-05, 18.05

In 1978, a group of feminists came down and took over the Collegian offices, demanding they have a page that would report issues of importance to women. The Women's Issues page was borne from this protest.

Well, now in 1991, it's your turn — yes, YOU, the readers of this page — to sit down and help keep this page alive. We need writers to cover events and keep in touch with what's going on with women in the Happy Valley. We especially need people with the energy and desire to cover issues for women of color.

This is the last page for the semester, but there is still time to write stories for the section. Also, if you have any events you want covered BEFORE the last day of classes — our last issue — please let the Women's Issues desk know before Tuesday, April 14.

As a graduating editor, I cannot emphasize to you enough that we get writers down here. It cannot be done by one or two people alone. If we at the Collegian are to serve the community right, we need the community's help. PLEASE COME DOWN AND WRITE. An informed community is an empowered community.

Come write for Women's Issues

Women's magazines are sexist, too

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

A novel thought occurred to me as I passed by the mini-store magazine rack yesterday: Men are not totally responsible for the exploitation of women in the media today!

The evidence that pushed me to this conclusion was a cover of the May 1991 ELLE magazine, which features a woman breast-deep (barely) in water. I started thinking, "What is the purpose for this choice of covers?"

I'm sure there may be some males who buy this magazine, and maybe even a few who picked it up only because of the cover; However, ELLE and its competitors, Cosmopolitan, Glamour, Vogue and others like them mainly cater to upper-middle class and upper-class women. Is there a clamoring for pictures like this on magazines, or is it just that the readers condone pictures, and even advertisements, that primarily exploit the female physique?

Unfortunately, most advertisements in women's magazines do picture parts of women's bodies in a sensual, erotic way. Again, these ads are for products that are almost exclusively bought by women. Bras, lingerie, perfume and feminine hygiene products are among the ads that are guilty of this.

I am fully aware of the portrayal of women in the media that caters to men. All you have to do is turn the tube on during a sports match on a Saturday afternoon to see what I mean. However, my premise is that women are treated just as badly on the pictures of women's magazines in general as they are in male-dominated media.

If this is the case, then we may have a cultural problem: women condone and even buy this exploitative portrayal of themselves, and thus they help to continue a vicious cycle.

I cannot stand any hypocrite who would on the one hand buy an issue of "progressive" Cosmopolitan, but at the same time scream their lungs out at the TV when a Bud Light commercial comes on. Both contain exploitative images of women.

If we first stop allowing women's magazines to exploit women, then it may be a little harder for the rest of society to do so. Use your purchasing power! I don't feel I am a particularly sensitive male, so maybe these ads bother others also.

I do not know how, when or why this portrayal started, but I assume it should not sell as well with women as it has. I believe that it is certainly not just the fault of men, but of our society as a whole.

But as long as these "women's" magazines try to make you believe that it's fun to skinny dip, and easy to become the "perfect woman" (tan, blonde, blue eyes, great figure, all in three simple steps), then everyone else will too.

This section needs help now

Phillips recreates the feminine roots of blues and jazz

By NICHOLAS OSTIS
Collegian Correspondent

Sandra Reaves Phillips
Fine Arts Center
Saturday, May 4

If anyone felt an earthquake on Saturday night, it originated in the Fine Arts Center where one of the best singer/songwriters/actresses you have ever heard of, Sandra Reaves-Phillips, was resurrecting the voices and personalities of a half dozen legendary 20th century giants in her "Late Great Ladies of the Blues" spectacle. Specifically these women were Ma Rainey, Bessie Smith, Ethel Waters, Billie Holiday, Dinah Washington and Mahalia Jackson.

Like the divas she honors, Ms. Reaves-Phillips sprouted from humble roots — a flatbed truck full of migrant workers in South Carolina. However, with a heap of talent and a bountiful heart and soul, she has ascended into national prominence, perennially featured at Jazz festivals in Canada, Europe and North Africa; in films, television and both on and off Broadway.

In a 20-song tour de force, the voluptuous and vivacious Reaves-Phillips escorted a half filled auditorium back in time to the speakeasies, roadhouses and great concert halls of America (1920-1960).

After her tuxedo clad band came out swinging with Duke Ellington's "Take The A Train" and "Sweet Georgia Brown," she burst on the stage to open her portion of the show with tow original compositions, "Blues Lament" and "Take Me as I Am," a rhythm and blues feast whose title aptly summed up the evening.

She referred to herself as, "two tons of fun" and roared, "Eat your heart out Oprah!" Thunder and lightening ensued as she shook her gluteus maximus to the blasts of the booming bass drum.

Humor and irony infused the show, especially with regard to her crack quintet, for the most part (four-fifths) a group one would never imagine to be musicians. The horn duo looked as if they should be collecting pensions and rocking. . .in a chair on a porch. The drummer's girth quite nearly prohibited him from playing. At one point she called him a "big old chunk of chocolate sitting there in the middle." The bespectacled pianist looked like a professor or investment consultant. The bassist? Well, he did look like a jazz musician.

Yet individually and as a group, they were every bit a match for her prodigious talent, swinging, bopping and bluesing and cruising.

Indeed, the funk was flying and against the black backdrop, her sparkling, shimmering, regal outfits — riots of color, oceans of sequins and waves of tassels — were a show unto themselves.

To emulate Ethel Waters, she donned a feathered headgear in burgandy, fuchsia and violet that was brilliant. As Bessie Smith, she sashayed across the stage in a hot pink gown with a fluffy white scarf and an outrageous matching white hat with an equally fluffy plume out to her; or there, if you will.

After intermission, her phasing of Billie "Lady Day" Holiday's "God Bless the Child" (complete with trademark flowers in the hair) was so hauntingly similar to the original that astonished gasps spread through the hall like a vocal circus after the first few lines. As dirty Dinah Washington, The Queen of the Blues, she donned a platinum wig and vocally undressed a hunk in the audience named Myron. In response to the question of his height, he answered, "six feet." The crown exploded when she then asked his shoe size. Visually poring over his rippled body, she sighed, "Can you lift weight?"

Following her salutes to the more carnally concerned crooners, she assumed the personality of gospel luminary Mahalia Jackson, who once performed for J.F.K. In a pure white silk gown with no slits (as were featured prominently in other gowns), with her hair in a tight bun and minimal make-up, she transformed the stage from honky tonk to chapel by singing, "He's Got the Whole World in His Hands," "Precious Lord," and "When the Saints go Marching In."

For an encore, she sang "Lean on Me" and further endeared herself to an already adoring crowd with a short, tasteful sermon about supporting the arts and each other and making the world a better place to be through appreciation.

Sandra Reaves-Phillips is a big, bold brassy and bawdy and belts out the blues with integrity of someone who has lived them. On the other hand, she's soft, sweet, sensitive and spiritual. Her voice puts a thump in your heart, a lump in your throat and a tear in your eye.

She wrote and conceived the whole expertly paced show and proved to be adept at ad-libbing as well. What an achievement that she can authenticate the greatest voices of this century's American music and still stand uniquely on her own to carry that legacy in her own voice into the next century.

Vice President Quayle ready to rule country

Dan Quayle

WASHINGTON (AP) — Vice President Dan Quayle was prepared to step into the short-term role of acting president should physicians have decided to administer electric shock treatment to correct President Bush's irregular heartbeat.

White House press secretary Marlin Fitzwater said Quayle worked out of his own office yesterday and "would have conducted the affairs of the presidency as he saw fit" should the temporary transfer of power have been necessary.

That prospect rekindled a partisan debate as to whether the 44-year-old Quayle bore the necessary credentials, with critics pointing to his low job rating in public opinion polls.

Fitzwater said doctors at Bethesda Naval Hospital would have decide before dawn yesterday whether to employ the shock procedure if Bush did not respond adequately to medication overnight. He described the procedure as routine and said it carried minimal risk.

Fitzwater said Bush would have been under general anesthesia during the treatment but might have been sedated only a few minutes. During that period, Quayle would have been acting president under provisions of the 25th Amendment.

Bush himself served nearly eight hours as acting president in July 1985 when then President Reagan underwent surgery for colon cancer.

In California, Reagan was asked Sunday if Quayle would be ready to step in for Bush. "I remember him as a very competent senator. I think he would do just fine," he replied.

The situation hearkens back to another controversial vice president, Richard Nixon, who like Quayle today found himself in a political hot seat when illness struck the president he served.

The question: Should the vice president be on the ticket again in 1992, as President Bush has said he will?

"That was the first thing that occurred to me when I heard the news," said Nixon biographer Herbert Parmet. "This is going to make the situation a lot hotter for Dan Quayle."

Brookings Institution scholar Stephen Hess, who was a speech writer for president Eisenhower and later a Nixon White House adviser, said Bush's irregular heartbeat presented "both a trying time and an opportunity" for the vice president.

Quayle telephoned Bush at Bethesda Naval Hospital on Sunday and then joined fellow worshipers at a suburban church in prayers for the president's speedy recovery.

Bush, 66, entered the hospital Saturday after experiencing an irregular heartbeat while jogging at Camp David, Md. His heartbeat was still irregular and kept him in the hospital Sunday.

Eisenhower suffered a heart attack in 1955 while vacationing in Colorado. He recovered slowly and announced his candidacy for re-election in February 1956.

"Nixon had a lot of opposition because he was too controversial," Parmet said. "There is no question that the Eisenhower heart attack increased the pressure."

"I think it's fairly clear that if Quayle is on the ticket, the Democrats will do their best to keep that issue alive. It will put a question in people's minds. I don't see how it could help but do it," Parmet said.

Tom Korologos, a Washington lobbyist and Republican strategist, said such Democratic arguments would no doubt affect some voters' thinking, but "if anybody goes over the full record, they will find that Quayle has done a fine job as vice president."

"I think Bush is comfortable with Quayle," Korologos said, "I don't think it is in the cards for him to dump Quayle even in the light of what has happened."

Shevardnadze visits; Middle East talks urged

WASHINGTON (AP) — Former Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard A. Shevardnadze proposed yesterday that worldwide sanctions be imposed against Middle Eastern countries that refuse to participate in direct peace talks.

Launching his first speaking tour since quitting abruptly four-and-a-half months ago. Shevardnadze said the danger of dictatorship that he warned about when he resigned has abated somewhat. And he expressed a measure of optimism that a recent pact between the leaders of nine Soviet republics may help avert chaos or civil war.

He called on the United States and other countries to extend bank credits and technical assistance to help avert economic and political catastrophe, which he said is likely if President Mikhail S. Gorbachev's reforms fail.

Addressing the 75th anniversary celebration of the Brookings Institution, Shevardnadze said Secretary of State James A. Baker III needs help in his campaign to launch U.S.-led peace talks between Israel and its Arab neighbors.

"Many have claimed places at the table but do little to get the talks started," Shevardnadze said. "There can be no justification for refusing to negotiate."

"We could apply sanctions to any country that refuses to negotiate directly" with other parties to a dispute that is before the U.N. Security Council, he suggested. He also proposed restricting arms shipments to the region to compel countries to end their arms race.

Separately, Baker said yesterday he expects to fly to the Middle East this week to push anew for a peace conference that would bring Israel and the Arab states together.

"As long as there is any reasonable prospect of any chance of success, we should continue to work at this," Baker said as he welcomed Shevardnadze to the State Department. Baker's trip will be his fourth since a cease-fire was agreed to in the Persian Gulf War.

Baker also said he planned to visit with Shevardnadze's successor, Alexander Bessmertnykh, to try to coordinate plans for a peace conference, which would be held under joint Soviet-American sponsorship.

Israel has said it is willing to talk to any of its enemies directly but does not want an international conference that might pressure Israel to make more concessions than its Arab neighbors. Saudi Arabia and the gulf states have refused to participate at the initial stage of any peace conference: Syria has said it would join talks only if they are sponsored by the United Nations and other outside powers.

Iacocca turns down Senate seat

HIGHLAND PARK, Mich. (AP) — Chrysler Corp. Chairman Lee Iacocca said yesterday he refused to accept a temporary appointment to the U.S. Senate seat from Pennsylvania left vacant by the death of Sen. John Heinz.

Pennsylvania Gov. Robert P. Casey has been having trouble filling the vacancy created by Heinz's death in an air crash last month. Casey flew to Detroit last week to meet with Iacocca.

"I was very flattered to by the governor's request, and I gave it serious and careful consideration," Iacocca said in a statement released by the company in this Detroit suburb.

"After lengthy discussion with my family and close friends, I concluded that I was not prepared to make the commitment necessary to fulfill the heavy responsibilities of a United States senator," he said.

Iacocca, 66, who grew up in Allentown, Pa., has been suggested in the past as a possible presidential candidate.

A committee was formed in 1986 to draft Iacocca for the Democratic presidential nomination for 1988. Iacocca disavowed the draft movement. However, in past interviews he has said he thought briefly about running for president.

Casey is a Democrat. Heinz was a Republican.

Whoever is appointed to the vacancy would serve until a Nov. 5 special election.

Heinz was killed April 4 in the crash of an airplane and a helicopter over a school yard in a suburb of Philadelphia.

Tsongas member of all-White club

BOSTON (AP) — Democratic presidential candidate Paul Tsongas belongs to a country club that reportedly has no Black members and has apparently never received an application from an African American.

James Cooney, a recent president of the Vesper Country Club in Tyngsborough, said membership is open to all races, religions and ethnic backgrounds.

He speculated there are no Black members because there are few Black golfers in the Lowell area.

"I don't think there are any members of any clubs in the Lowell area who are Black," he said.

Club officials said they did not begin admitting women as full voting members until last fall. The Vesper club opened in 1875.

Tsongas said he was assured at that time that the club had no discriminatory membership policies and that he is comfortable there is no written or unwritten discriminatory policy.

Asked if he ever had seen a Black at the Club, Tsongas said, "I don't know what happens on the golf course side. We go up there basically to swim in July. I don't remember if there has been or not."

"I think the question is whether the club has a nondiscriminatory policy," said Tsongas, who swims competitively. "I was told there was no discrimination. I think the issue is openness. If there was not a policy of openness, we would not be members.

Men's track takes third

By KEITH BENNETT
Collegian Correspondent

A strong team effort enabled the University of Massachusetts men's track and field team to place third in the Eastern Conference Championship Meet Saturday.

Conference powerhouse Rhode Island won the meet with 183 points. They were followed by Southern Connecticut with 146 points and UMass with 119. Rounding out the top five were Springfield with 93 and the University of Lowell with 42.

"We had a real good team effort," said head coach Ken O'Brien. "A number of athletes registered their best performances of the year this weekend."

Sprinter Kevin Walters led the team with a victory in the 200-meters and a second place in the 100. Walters ran 22.46 seconds in winning the 200. His time of 10.97 in the 100 was just .01 seconds behind the first place time.

Joe Kourafas also placed in two individual events for the Minutemen. He won the long jump with a distance of 21 feet, 11 inches and placed fourth in the high jump with a leap of 6-6.

UMass' greatest strength was in the distance events. The Minutemen took victories in the 3,000-meter steeplechase, the 5,000 and the 10,000.

Matt Simon won the steeplechase with a time of 9:34.7.

Jon Corso led four UMass runners to places in the 5,000. Corso won the event in 15:03. He was followed by Craig Cormier in third place, Brian Fallon in fourth and John Raach in sixth. O'Brien said that he was especially pleased with the performances of Cormier, Fallon and Raach who are freshmen.

Pat Ryan and Mike Davis finished first and third, respectively, in the 10,000. Ryan ran 33:04.24 and Davis 33:09.74.

Jeff White ran his best time of the year in taking second place in the 110 hurdles. White ran the barriers in 14.99.

Steve Brown also grabbed a second place for UMass. He ran 1:53.77 to grab the runner-up spot in the 800. Gerry Squires finished third in the 1,500 with a time of 3:59.32.

Brian Bednarek cleared a height of 13-6 to take fourth in the pole vault.

Jeff Peterson took a pair of fifth places for UMass. He placed fifth in the triple jump with a distance of 42-0 and in the discus with a throw of 135-11.

Grey later teamed up with Walters, Brown and Tom Hooper to finish fourth in the 4 x 400 relay team. Their time was 3:25.1.

The Minutemen now prepare for the New Englands May 10-11

44 of the games played this season. She has a .336 batting average, combined with only three strikeouts on the season.

She has the third highest on base percentage (.404) behind hitting leaders Barbara Marean, and Aprile.

In the field, Miller has 105 put outs and 69 assists for a total fielding percentage of .946.

Also with four hits and two doubles was Sherri Kuchinskas, the catcher. Kuchinskas boosted her batting average to .304 from .293 on the weekend. In her last 15 at bats, Kuchinskas has come alive to the tune of eight hits, including three extra base hits.

Marean has cooled off a bit at the plate as she contributed only two hits in eight at bats, hitting leader Marean dropped her stellar batting average to .443 from .455.

In the last five games, Marean's average has dropped from a .470, going 3-for-14. Yet, Marean made the two hits this weekend count, reaching on a double, and earning an RBI.

Other players with two hits included Cherie DellAnno and Bonnie Shilling. Peggy Bush, Claffey, and Amy Cockley contibuted one hit.

In a special ceremony, the team and fans recognized the five seniors that have contributed to this winning program. Bonnie Schilling, Barbara Marean, Jen Miller and Christine Collins will be graduating this spring.

Softball gears up for late season drive after big weekend

• UM Drops finale to FSU

By THOMAS A. GEORGE
Collegian Staff

On Sunday under fine weather, the University of Massachusetts softball team lost to Florida State University, 2-0.

"In the first inning of that contest, UMass with one out, had runners on second and third. However, the team failed to convert on that opportunity.

"They didn't make the mistakes we did," said head coach Elaine Sortino "In that kind of game, you don't get too many chances."

Stranded baserunners have been an Achilles heel for the Minutewomen, who left 19 base runners this weekend. In a striking contrast, UMass has left 281 runners to a stark 195 from opponents this season.

The loss ended a nine game win streak, moving the Minutewomen record to 33-11.

FSU's Lady Seminoles came into The Diamond Classic Softball Tournament ranked eleventh in the nation. FSU ended the weekend with a 56-10 record, defeating UConn and Princeton It was FSU's first appearance in this tournament.

The UMass team finished 2-1 on the weekend, after defeating Princeton, 1-0 and Connecticut, 2-1 on Saturday.

UConn entered the Tournament with a 34-13 record on a four game win streak. In the last NCAA poll, UConn was a vote getter for the top twenty in the nation.

"We really wanted to beat UConn" said pitcher Darlene Claffey. "They're one of our biggest rivals."

The Huskies scored the lone run on six hits, and committed one error. In the past meetings, Claffey had held UConn to one hit in the first win and five in another loss.

For Claffey, her record moves to 18-5, with an ERA of 1.12. Claffey pushed her strikeout total over the three-digit mark, throwing eight on the weekend for a total of 101 on the season.

This was the fifth meeting versus the Huskies for the Minutewomen this season, UConn still holds the lead, as the record stands at UMass 2-UConn 3.

UMass took Princeton with a 1-0 win behind a four hit performance. Princeton posted three hits, and the losing pitcher was Lisa Moore of Wellesly, MA.

Princeton's record as of tourney time was 28-11, and had a hot pitcher in Moore. Her ERA was an impressive 0.79, and had struck out 186 batters on the season.

In the contest versus Princeton, Holly Aprile took the mound for her 15th win. Aprile's ERA is a 1.24 with a 15-6 record. She notched her sixth shutout, with a one strikeout, two walk performance.

Aprile, the second best hitter on the team, was 0-for-9 in a strange dry spell for a regular producer.

On the weekend, the UMass bats were much quieter than usual. The team, who over the last ten games had averaged nine hits a game, was held to seventeen hits on the weekend.

Second baseman Jen Miller had four hits, including two doubles and a RBI.

Miller has been a consistent performer, starting in all

With an NCAA championship bid in sight, the University of Massachusetts softball team must play one more strong week of softball to receive an invitation to the big show.

The week will not be an easy one for the Minutewomen with regionally ranked Aldelphia in town today and the Atlantic 10 championships set for this weekend.

"We have our necks out on the chopping block this week," coach Elaine Sortino said. "We play some very tough teams, regional powers, and we can't afford to lose. We need five wins this week to make the tournament, so we must sustain our momentum and not let down."

The top two teams from each region of the country recieve invitations to the NCAA's. According to the NCAA, new regional and national rankings will be out today. Vying for the top spot in the northeast are UMass and Connecticut. The Minutewomen defeated the Huskies 2-1 on Saturday, but UConn leads the season series 3-2.

Connecticut has no more games this season and therefore is a shoo-in for the NCAA's. If UMass has a bad week they could drop out of the top two.

"We are the only team still playing," Sortino said. "Connecticut is done and they should be in. If we play bad we could drop out. We have a lot to do in the next week."

That week starts today, on Totman Field, at 3 p.m. with doubleheader against Aldelphi.

Adelphi is 17-18 on the season and would love to jump above the .500 mark by sweeping UMass. Adelphi was frustrated by Penn State this weekend dropping three of four to the Lady Lions, including two in extra innings.

UMass has already defeated the Panthers three times this season. In March, at the National Invitational Tournament in San Jose, Calif., the Minutewomen crushed Adelphi 7-0 behind the strong pitching of Darlene Claffey (18-5 ERA). On April 28th UMass swept the Panthers 5-3, 3-1 at Garden City, N.J.

"They are a strong hitting team," Sortino said. "We will have to pitch well and get some solid defense to shut them down."

Adelphi is batting .342 as a team and is averageing 3.9 runs per game. They have four players batting over .300.

"Last time we played UMass our hitters didn't hit when they were supposed to," said Adelphi coach Nancy Oestrike. "That will have to change for us to win."

Men's Crew wins New Englands

By LYNN FRANKEL
Collegian Correspondent

More than a dozen New England crew teams travelled to Lake Quinsigamon in Worcester to participate in the New England Championships. The University of Massachusetts walked away from the regatta Saturday with three silver and one gold medal in the competition.

The varsity heavyweight men won the premier event of the afternoon as they powered their shell down the 2000-meter course in an impressive 5.52, 4.3 seconds ahead of the second place crew.

According to head coach Dave Trond the varsity eight boat had a commanding lead at the 1000-meter mark and went on to dictate the rest of the race.

Senior Dave Ring said he was overwhelmed when the boat approached the medals dock. Ring said he thought UMass was the crowd favorite and support from alumni, family and friends was incredible.

Alumni association member Brendan Morrissey said he was excited to see three former lightweight rowers(Rich Scannell, Dave Schor and Chris Marino) make the tough transition into heavyweight competition.

The New England Men's Heavyweight Champions are coxswain Mary Lockyer, Chris Marino, Brian Jewitt, Jeff Vohr, Mike Rademacher, Dave Ring, Rich Scannell, Keith Burgoyne and Dave Schor.

Coach Dave Trond said he was also very impressed with the performance of the JV eight. The team had come on strong late in the season, defeating Coast Guard and URI. The boat was successful Saturday as they won a silver medal in the regatta.

The boat was in fourth place with 400 meters left. An all-out sprint bolstered the eight into second.

The boat consisted of cox Jen Bragg, Jeff Capabianco, Nat Delmanzo, Steve Casco, Tim Stone, Bob Leahy, Cameron Clarke, Jared Browning and Steve Weiner.

Novice Men's coach Shawn Talbot said his lightweight eight had a "great mental victory" Saturday and they scored a silver medal.

Talbot said his crew bounced back from two tough losses last weekend.

The UMass varsity women proved their adopted slogan "We are faster" to be true as they walked away from competition on Saturday with a silver medal.

At 1000-meters, both UMass and Tufts walked through the other boats in the field and battled it out for first and second. The UMass women had, at that point in the race, destroyed boats that had handed them defeat earlier in the season.

Junior Kerry Clarkin said that the team's final heat was both physically and emotionally draining, but an entire year of intense hard work and dedication was rewarded in a mere seven minutes.

Seven seat Jennifer Geary said the silver medal has put the boat in a positive frame of mind for next weekend's National Championships.

The varsity boat is comprised of coxswain Jen Blum, Allison Hurtwitch, Jennifer Geary, Deanna Cook, Jen Lambert, Kerry Clarkin, Courtney Harold, Rachel White and Jenn Hinds.

The JV women came in third in a hard fought race.

The University of Massachusetts crew team now heads to Philadelphia to take on Dad Vail division schools from all over the United States. The team will face good programs from schools like Virginia and Temple as well as arch-rivals New Hampshire and the Coast Guard Academy.

Dave Trond said the varsity heavyweights should be seeded in the top five after their performance at the New Englands.

The team leaves for Philadelphia, on Thursday in the hopes of returning to Amherst with some "hardware."

Baseball set to host Northeastern

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

An appropriate theme for the University of Masssachusetts baseball team this week would be "three to get ready."

The 22-22-1 Minutemen, assured of second place and an Atlantic 10 Conference Tournament berth, have three games in three days to prepare mentally and physically for their season-long goal of winning the A-10's and advancing to the NCAA Regionals.

That preparation begins at 1 p.m. today when Northeastern visits Earl Lorden Field for a doubleheader.

The Huskies enter today's action at 27-11. Their most recent action was a 5-4 loss to New England powerhouse Maine on Sunday. Northeastern actually led that contest 2-0 for the first five innings, and kept the score close until the end.

"They're a good ballclub," said UMass assistant Norm Hayner of the Huskies. "They swing the bats well."

Hayner said that the Minutemen will use several pitchers against Northeastern this afternoon. He added further that the Minutemen must trim their 27-man roster to 22 players for tournament play, which gives the coaching staff the task of evaluating players today and tomorrow vs. Central Connecticut.

Administration recognizes April elections

By MARC ELLIOTT
Collegian Staff

The administration recognized the April 9 student government elections for the first time Monday affirming Kevin Newnan as student trustee and David Gagne as president, while crushing Jennifer Wood's plans to run for trustee in the election originally planned for tomorrow, sources said.

Gagne said Vice-Chancellor of Student Affairs Jo-Anne Vanin told him that the administration this week will announce their decision recognize the student sponsored elections in a letter to the campus community rather than face a lawsuit for violating the Massachusetts law mandating the timing for student trustee election. The state law mandates that the election be held at the beginning of April.

Gagne also said Vanin told him that while Gagne's election is not protected by state law, the administration will respect his election until at least September. The administration plans to hold elections in the fall for seats in the Commission on Student Governance's new student government provided the referendum passes during tomorrow's campus-wide vote.

Newnan summed up his assessment of the administration's decision simply, "Vanin fought the law and the law won."

Newnan also expressed regret that the senate had to resort to legal means to coerce the administration into respecting his election, adding that he hoped all involved can work well together in the future.

"It's unfortunate that we had to resolve this on the legal front rather than the diplomatic, but now that the situation has been resolved, hopefully all parties involved will move on," Newnan said.

Newnan also urged students to vote against tomorrow's referendum, describing it as an "attempt by the administration to impose their will on the students."

Gagne said while he is happy the administration is going to allow him to "represent students" over the summer, he is disturbed by the prospect of being forced to run again in the fall should the referendum pass.

Wood said she was upset that the administration neglected to confirm the legality of their actions before attempting to delay the trustee election.

"I counted on the fact that they had done their footwork, that they were adult enough and responsible enough [to check the state law's restrictions]," Wood said.

Wood, who learned about the decision through a third party, said she was frustrated with the administration's failure to tell her what their decision would be.

While she said she was waiting until this week to start campaigning for the administration's election, originally scheduled for Thursday, she spent four to five nights collecting signatures for her nomination papers and printed about 8,000 campaign posters earlier this week.

Vanin was unavailable for comment.

The Undergraduate Student Senate hired the Northampton law firm of Barnes and Ethridge two weeks ago to force the Office of Student Affairs to recognize the elections which were run by student senators opposed to the referendum despite the administration's refusal to recognize them.

The administraton announced they would not recognize the April elections four months ago, when former Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Dennis Madson set up the Commission on Undergraduate Governance to restructure the Student Government Association. The administration instead planned to hold an election for only the student trustee tomorrrow at the same time as the referendum vote on the commission's new student government.

Madson, who is now working for Lewis and Clark College in Portland, Ore., said he intervened at the request of the student senate officers who claimed that the Student Government Association, as it was structured, was ineffective in serving the student body.

Presidents' health not always public knowledge

WASHINGTON (AP) — The White House says it has tried to give reporters "the raw facts" and then some on President Bush's irregular heartbeat. That has not always been the case when illness struck the presidency.

Grover Cleveland's cancer was passed off as a toothache. The nation was kept in the dark about the stroke that incapacitated Woodrow Wilson. Franklin D. Roosevelt's deteriorating condition was kept from the public.

Bush's first hospitalization since his election in 1988 has focused attention again on a long history of presidential illnesses that often has been marked by deception.

Bush's aides and doctors have been at pains to avoid any suggestion of a cover-up.

A team of four doctors from the White House, George Washington University and Bethesda Naval Hospital briefed reporters and answered questions on Bush's irregular heartbeat for 37 minutes Monday after the president returned from the hospital.

White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater gave a series of briefings, starting Saturday night after Bush suffered shortness of breath while jogging at Camp David, Md.

That's a far cry from what happened after Cleveland was diagnosed in June 1983 as having cancer in the roof of his mouth.

The president was spirited away to a friends's yacht in New York harbor, where surgery was performed. When he arrived four days later at his summer home, a news agency reported that a malignant growth had been removed in the operation. His doctors, however, insisted he was suffering only from rheumatism and a toothache.

"A precedent has been established: the president of the United States had decided that his illness, even when it was believed to be life-threatening was a private matter," Dr. Edward B. MacMahon and Leonard Curry wrote in their 1987 book, "Medical Cover-ups in the White House."

After President James A. Garfield was shot at a Washington railroad station on July 2, 1881, he lingered for weeks before dying. Doctors followed what The New York Times called "the questionable habit . . . of giving out encouraging news overnight and taking it back, or at least qualifying it, in the morning."

Wilson suffered a stroke on Oct 2, 1919, paralyzing the left side of his body, impairing his vision and producing personality changes that affected his judgement.

Adm. Cary T. Grayson the White House physician, conceded that the president's condition was "not at all good" in a state-

Economist to speak on human needs, industry tonight

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

John Kenneth Galbraith, one of the most versatile and celebrated economists of the twentieth century, will be speaking tonight in Memorial Hall at 7:30 p.m.

Galbraith's lecture, titled "War, Industrial Development, and Human Needs," will be the last in a series of lectures on "The Global Consumer in Transition: Challenging the Contradictions," sponsored by the Division of Home Economics.

According to Sam Bowles, an economics professor at UMass, Galbraith has differed from many economists and academics by making his writings and teachings accessible to almost everyone.

"He is unique among economists in his ability to speak to a broad group of people," Bowles said. "He is one of the few economists that the general population looks to guidance for on economic matters."

Bowles, along with UMass economics professors Richard Edwards and William Shepherd, have edited a collection of essays in honor of Galbraith entitled Unconventional Wisdom.

In one essay, Harvard professor Henry Rosovsky notes an auto mechanic in Hoboken, New Jersey ask-

40 killed in Malaysian explosion

KUALA LUMPUR, Malaysia (AP)— Explosions yesterday destroyed a fireworks plant and started a fire that spread to six nearby factories and 50 homes. At least 40 people were killed and many others were missing.

The national news agency, Bernama, said as many as 100 people were feared killed in the fireworks factory alone. The agency said about 150 people were in the factory in Sungei Buloh, on Kuala Lumpur's outskirts, when the explosions and fires began.

Badaruddin Mat, the Fire Department director general, told reporters only one woman was found alive inside the Astra Fireworks plant.

After nightfall, firefighters with flashlights began searching the burned ruins of the factories and homes, he said.

Crowds gathered at the fire site in hope of finding missing relatives. Mohamad Tahir Anuar, 24, said his wife was killed in the fire and he did not know the fate of 10 other relatives who worked in the fireworks factory.

Dr. Megat Buhainuddin Abdul Rahman, director of the government's General Hospital, told reporters 14 bodies had been brought to the hospital and 26 bodies still were at the scene.

Officials said 50 people were hospitalized for injuries suffered in the explosions and fires.

Scores of army and civilian firefighters battled the fires, which the Village Development and Security Committee said affected a 125-acre area.

Bernama reporters said at least 300 people, mostly factory workers, were left homeless by the fires, which raged for three hours after the initial late afternoon blasts at the fireworks factory.

The agency said one woman was struck by a car and killed as people fled in panic.

ed him what he did for a living. When Rosovsky replied he taught at Harvard, the mechanic asked from under the car, "do you happen to know Professor Galbraith?"

Ironically, though Galbraith's widespread fame throughout the world may have diminished his reputation among academic circles, it is part of his design.

"[Galbraith] has a life-time strategy of how to make people listen to him," Bowles said. "He writes books that the rest of the population will read, and then economists become embarrassed not to have read them."

Kenneth Sharpe, in a book he wrote on Galbraith, notes after he wrote the scholarly work, A Theory of Price Control, Galbraith "resolved never to write a book for economists again."

"His major contribution has been as a leading critic of the mainstream textbook version of economic theory," Bowles said.

While bucking the orthodox trends of the economics profession, Galbraith has also made a contribution as a diplomat, government official, and as an outspoken social and political critic.

"[Galbraith's] a battler for things he believes in...which is unusual among academics," Bowles said. "He doesn't use his ivory tower position for a life of comfort, but to strike a blow for making a better life for people to live in."

Throughout his long career, Galbraith has served in such varied positions as a deputy in the Office of Price Administration during World War II, on the editorial board of Fortune Magazine, and as United States ambassador to India during the Kennedy administration. In addition, he has found the time to publish 35 books and innumerable articles.

Galbraith's greatest contribution to American society in the past six decades, may be his role as social and political critic.

"Galbraith's period of greatest effect was during the late 1950's and 1960's, when he alerted America to the dangers of private affluence versus public squalor," Bowles said. "His message was really well received."

By "public squalor", Galbraith referred to the neglect of roads, bridges, and the general decline of the American infrastructure.

"Even in the conservative 1980s, his voice is still listened to," Bowles said. "There are any number of people now in Congress who consider what Galbraith says as essential in their daily work.

"Nobody from the liberal side of the spectrum has been as successful as he has in getting his ideas out."

Galbraith himself best summed up what he has dedicated himself to when he wrote in his book The Affluent Society, that "The enemy of the conventional wisdom is not ideas but the march of events."

Prop. 2 1/2 override defeated

By the Associated Press

Voters in four communities defeated Proposition 2½ overrides Monday that would have enabled officials to collect more tax money for various local projects.

In Andover, Hull, Millis and Webster voters opposed attempts to ease tight budgets by overriding the tax limiting measure approved more than a decade ago.

In Medway one override was approved, a second was defeated.

Passed in 1980, Proposition 2½ caps local property tax increases to 2.5 percent annually.

If the community wishes to spend more money, an override must be approved by the voters. General overrides are permanent, while overrides for specific projects last only one year.

The overrides considered Monday varied dramatically in size and scope.

In Millis, seven separate proposals were defeated, said town administrator Charles Aspinwall.

They ranged from a $2,000 request for a computer to a $682,500 sewer project override, he said.

"This means some staff will be cut, equipment won't be purchased, we won't be offering a hazardous waste day, the transfer station may be closed two days a week, and the school department and public works department will be eliminating positions," he said yesterday.

The largest override defeated Monday was in Andover where residents soundly rejected a $1.5 million request from the school department.

Wendell Mattheson, a member of the board of registrars, said 5,309 of the people voted against the override and 2,823 endorsed it.

Several communities considered debt-exclusion overrides. In Hull, for instance, officials unsuccessfully lobbied for $1.2 million in debt-inclusion money to pay operating costs and keep town employees on the payroll.

Medway voters were the only people Monday who voted themselves at least a partial increase in property taxes, approving a $542,000 debt-exclusion override by 1,681 votes to 1,629, according to the town $214,000 override for a sewer construction project.

The 100,000 override rejected by voters in Webster would have covered extra legal and consultant fees for the town to fight a proposed landfill on the Douglas-Webster line, said Town Clerk Regina Bugan.

"People are starting to think we've lost the cause and why try to fight it anymore," she said of the town's opposition to the dump on Route 16.

What is a Textbook Buyback?

Three times during each semester the Textbook Annex brings in a wholesaler to buy textbooks from students. Wholesalers are in the business of selling used books to colleges and universities across the country. Therefore, in determining how much they will pay a student for a book they must consider the demand for that book as well as the shipping and handling costs involved in processing and reselling the book. This is why prices vary and indeed change frequently.

The best time to sell books is at the end of the semester. At that time the Annex will pay 50% of the new price for a book if we have an order for that book for the following semester. If we do not, the wholesaler may make you an offer.

If you have questions please ask the people doing the buyback or the Annex staff. They will be more than happy to answer your questions and give you any tips that may be applicable to your situation.

When is the next Textbook Buyback?

The end of the semester Textbook Buyback is:

at the Textbook Annex:

May 15-17,	9:00 am-4:00 pm
May 18,	11:00 am-4:00 pm

Soaked at Bread and Circus

Have you tasted the juiciest fruit in the world?

I have. At Bread and Circus.

The fruit is not juicy and mouth-watering because of its great taste, texture or color.

It's because of the price.

I got soaked at the Bread and Circus.

Gayle Long

The temperature went up two weekends ago and I thought it would be great to go over to Bread and Circus and buy some fruit.

What could be better for you on a warm spring day than to go outside, play some tennis, read Sister Carrie and have a cornucopia of fresh fruit when hungry?

Unfortunately, what happened was I ended up getting milked at the cash register.

As I walked through the display of exotic fruits and veggies, I noticed something else in the Valley's premiere supermarket — the exotic prices.

The strawberries were $1.49 a pint (at another nearby store, they were $1.29 a pint) If you don't care about quality, you can get them for 99 cents a pint.

Of course, you never know what things are really worth until after you buy them — and so I did.

I bought a Costa Rican pineapple for 89 cents a pound (the next day on another produce excursion I found pineapples for 49 cents a pound).

Needless to say, the fruit left a bad taste in my mouth and a hole in my pocket. Not that the quality of the fruit was bad mind you, but it wasn't anything special.

Another great thing about Bread and Circus is they have the fruit you've never heard of. Fruit you see in the Stop and Shop commercials but you see in the typical grocery store maybe once or twice a year. Mangoes, papays, boysenberries, pomegrantes, and kumquats. Yum.

But the best was the uglifruit. Uglifruit are actually large tangerines with an incredibly (you guessed it) ugly rind.

I was quite intrigued by the uglifruit, and despite the fact I had no idea what the uglifruit really was, I bought it as an adventure. I liked the taste of the uglifriut, but tangerines are much nicer to look at and I expect you pay for the descriptive name of the citrus as well.

Needless to say, a tangerine would have done the job as well, and I wouldn't have been afraid to cut the fruit open.

Of course I understand fruit and the Bread and Circus is organically grown, meaning there are no pesticides, nothing bad for the human body. And that makes me happy. I don't want to glow in the dark, die of food poisoning or even make my children have birth defects, but come on.

Maybe all fruit should be grown organically, so the "my body is a temple" thing works for all of us. Maybe then people will go to the Bread and Circus and not notice the price difference.

I don't make a million dollars every week, and bringing home the tofu and frying it up in a pan isn't worth it if the tofu costs more than the bacon.

So, until the produce market is consistent in its prices, the comparison shopper is on the loose, in search of quality fruit and vegetables at a reasonable price.

For me, at least, there's only one way to remember the pricey overpriced produce.

Bread and Soak-up.

"IT'S DONALD TRUMP!"

Reader finds Levinson foolish

After reading the column, "What do they teach us?"(May 3), I find myself asking its author, Jeremy Levinson, several questions. The first of which is, "Aren't you just a little cynical?"

Mr. Levinson writes: "...grades have no correlation whatsoever to anything of value extracted by a student from the course material." What does that mean? Does it mean that grades don't relate to the quality of the student? Does it mean that grades don't relate to the quality of the professor? Or does it mean that grades don't relate to the quality of the course?

Mr. Levinson writes: "In the Humanities and Social Sciences, we're generally dealing with human events processes and institutions so the subsequent matter takes on their depth and dynamism. People have written for years on this stuff without saying anything of consequence.." Another question for Mr. Levinson: "Have you read your own column lately?"

Finally, Mr. Levinson writes: "Never confuse an A with having derived value from a course. Nor a D with the reverse." Does that mean that every A I ever achieved was worthless? Does it mean that every D I have never received was an opportunity lost?

Anyone reading this letter will notice there are a lot of questions in it. I ask them because I do not know the answers, unlike Mr. Levinson. My education will continue so long as I continue to ask these questions. It is unsurprising to learn that Mr. Levinson once quit high school, but has returned for three years of college. Still, I have one last question for him: "What have you learned?"

Collegian amendments racist

We are appalled, but not surprised, by the Collegian's most recent attempts to silence the Third World Affairs, the Multicultural Affairs and the Black Affairs pages.

These pages, which only appear once every two weeks, are the Collegian's only consistent voices speaking against racism and imperialism, and for the liberation of "Third World" peoples.

Last week the Collegian voted down a proposal that would allow the editors of the aforementioned pages to be elected by their respective communities.

The Collegian's motives become clearer with its simultaneous attempt to disallow graduate students from holding editorships. [The staff held a vote to decide whether graduate students would be allowed to hold these editorship positions.]

Since its creation in Fall 1989, through militant action, most articles on the TWA page have been written by graduate students and its longstanding editor is a graduate student.

They have voiced unmitigated criticism of American foreign policy (especially in the Persian Gulf), Israeli government policy and of American conservatives, liberals and would-be leftists alike. The TWA page, along with the Multicultural Affairs page, has also offered a political perspective on Third World cultures not found elsewhere, i.e. — culture in the context of liberation struggles.

The Collegian's attempt to suppress this perspective is characteristic of "multiculturalism" at the Collegian, and in White Amerika in general: "Please express your culture, but on our terms."

Just as we support the Women's Issues page, the Lesbian, Bisexual and Gay Issues editorship and the call for a Jewish Issues editor, we support the right of students from all communities on campus to define themselves, their struggles, their aspirations, on their own terms.

The Collegian tries to justify its reactionary stance by proclaiming its autonomy or "independence" from the University: "WE are a self-supporting newspaper, so WE [who's we — enlightened Platonic editors?] decide what goes on OUR pages." Who reads the Collegian, thereby prompting businesses to advertise in the newspaper, if not the community at large? Some universities recognize the mutual responsibility involving a campus newspaper and its readership so the vote for those newspapers' editors-in-chief, for instance, is open to the whole student body.

Interestingly, the Collegian is now claiming its ndependence on the Undergraduate Student Senate constitution to justify its attempts to bar graduate students from editorships. Funny how an institution's self-perception changes in order to fulfill its agenda.

The blindness of the majority of the Collegian staff to such blunt and transparent mechanisms of exclusion have once more proven their inseparability from a White, ethnocentric, liberal Establishment. A paternalistic establishment so full of its legitimacy that it forgets its relentless hostility to subaltern groups. We are awaiting, with little suspense, the abundant rationalizations of the Collegian.

College life causes many changes

Holy Cow, does one year of UMass really change a person— one's attitudes, ideas, customs. College really does a number on you, and often for the better. It opens up your mind to a world of ideas, many of which may clash with your mind to a world of ideas, many of which may clash with your deep-set, ingrained beliefs. It opens up a world of experience for you. It can be cool at times and at other times frustrating to examine your inward compass — many of us in college ask ourselves: Where am I going? What am I going to do with my life? It is straining and scary to ponder such tough questions. But what I do know is that this University has greatly changed me in the last year.

David Massey

I never used to listen to Led Zepellin until I came to UMass. Now, it is sort of like a daily ritual. Before entering Orchard Hill, I didn't know the difference between such Zep classics as "Black Dog" and "Black Mountain Side," "Communication Breakdown" and "Custard Pie." After being exposed to the world of Page, Plant, Jones, and Bonham, they're damn near "Gods" of music in my book.

I never used to drink until I came to UMass. I was dazed and confused when it came to differentiating between a Miller, and a Molsen, let alone liking the taste. Back in high school (the old days) I wasn't aware of parties, or alcohol. And I guess they say this is the time to experiment even though the dangers of getting myself in serious trouble every time I open up another always lurks in the back of my mind.

I never used to skip class. But at UMass, I figure that I am paying for this and if I don't feel like trudging down to Astronomy, I won't. that simple. I'm in control here.

I never used to not worry about grades. Grades, to me, are secondary at UMass. I didn't come here to graduate with a certain GPA — I came to learn, to experience and experiment, to open up, to explore ideas.

I never used to go to dance clubs. But every weekend going to Katina's to move something, always remains an option.

I never used to stay up to 1 or 2 a.m. in high school. Here my schedule is much different, more diverse, do more things, meet a lot more people, and I need more time in the day to do everything I want to do.

I never knew what GLB stood for until I came to this university. Heck, I had never met, to the best of my knowledge, someone who was openly Gay, Lesbian, or Bisexual.

I never got my news solely from the daily newspapers. Now, that is, in general, all I really rely on. I love not always having to 'tune out' in front of the TV, which usually spurts out mindless and trivial crud, anyway. Kill your TV, as the saying goes, and mine is definitely dead.

I never used to read the Collegian. Now I write for it. Boy, does this place change you.

David Massey is a Collegian staff member

Can't just 'be gay'

I was sitting outside of the classroom when two of my classmates sat down beside me. One of them turns to the other shaking the Collegian, and says, "Can you believe that two out of four articles on the front page of the paper are about gay rights? I mean, who cares? It seems there is always a rally about something. Sometimes I would rather be prejudiced just to piss people off." Interestingly enough, although maybe not relevant, the class we were waiting for was History 387 — The Holocaust. She went on to say that she doesn't wear a banner across her chest that says she screws guys, why can't they just 'be gay'. At the time I just gave a sarcastic laugh, mainly because I didn't know what else to do. If I had been given a few more minutes this might have been what I would have said.

When I can 'just be gay,' believe me, I will. It all sounds so easy. Of course she doesn't wear a banner because everyone already assumes that she 'screws guys,' but don't assume that everyone else does... or that they don't. The concept of 'gay rights' may be confusing to some. We are not advocating for anything that heterosexual people are not already guaranteed. I cannot wait for the day when we don't need laws to prevent discrimination, when we can receive all of the benefits of being officially recognized by the state and in society as couples of the same sex, and when we can walk at night with our lovers without fearing for our lives.

When this finally becomes a reality, only then will I put down my banner, stop attending marches and rallies, and remove the pink triangles from my book bag. Because only then will these things become unnecessary.

After Warren Harding suffered the heart attack from which he died, doctors issued statements describing his illness as a digestive disturbance.

Roosevelt was so sick with angina pains after his fourth inauguration that he had to rest in the White House Green Room while Vice Adm. Ross T McIntire, told reporters, "Everything's fine."

Throughout Roosevelt's presidency, the arteriosclerosis that led to his death went unreported. The extent of Roosevelt's paralysis was also played down.

A milestone in public information about presidential illnesses was reached when President Dwight Eisenhower suffered a heart attack in Denver in 1955. Eisenhower later wrote that he told his press secretary Jim Hagerty, "Tell the truth, the whole truth: don't try to conceal anything."

A restructured student government unveiled

After failure and chaos, groups join at commission

By JEFF CLEARY
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association was an ineffectual mess last semester and both students and administrators wanted a change. At the end of last fall, the Student Senate moved into a constitutional convention to try to fix itself. Time ran out and the senators decided to finish the work in the spring semester.

Over intersession, Irene Carew, director of the Student Activities Office, created a plan to restructure student government that included the formation of a commission which would develop the new government. The commission would be comprised of staff, faculty and students.

However, this plan was forwarded only to the SGA officers who asked the administration Jan. 30 to help them re-structure. Many senators objected to the administration's intrusion into what they deemed strictly "student affairs." After much debate, the Commission of Student Governance was established, with members from the senate and SAO.

The new vice chancellor of student affairs, Jo-Anne Vanin, charged the commission with the task of solving the problems of the old SGA structure. "Everything is on the table," she said.

The commission then began to identify the problems and researching other student government models.

After several meetings, the commission agreed on a structure similar to the one that will be on the referendum tomorrow. Some important differences included placing the director of SAO and a newly-formed Director of Research and Training (or Advocacy, as was originally proposed) answering to the SATF Review and SAB, respectively.

At their next meeting, Vanin scrapped the segment that required report to the SATF Review and the SAB. She said the commission could not make changes in the duties of professional staff and indeed the director of SAO could not be made to answer to any group other than the Division of Student Affairs. Many members of the Commission were very displeased at this new amendment.

In the past, student government approved the appointments of the staff for the SAO and such services as Legal Services and the Off Campus Housing Office. However, few people can remember accurately how student government has progressed since the early 1970s. Ever since former Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis Madson arrived in 1979, student government and its perception has changed drastically.

The commission adjusted the structure to the vice chancellor's amendments and removed the reporting lines from the student government. At the next meeting, Carew presented the commission a new plan for the SATF Review Committee, suggesting that had all budget decisions would be made by administrators.

The students on the commission argued fervently and finally negotiated the current SATF Review Committee. Now the whole $2 million budget for student government must go through a board of 14 students and six staff and then through the council.

Besides money, the only really touchy issue the commission dealt with after that was appointed seats. The old senate structure never had its constitution recognized by the trustees because it appointed seats for "special constituencies" such as the LBGA and TWC seats. The commission abolished those seats and replaced them with students appointed from the offices of the PGLA, OTWA, Everywoman's Center and Disability Services to serve only as informational liaisons to the council.

With a week left before the referendum, the senate pulled its recognition of the commission and its six senatorial representatives. The senate will create a task force committee next fall to restructure the SGA and will use the commission's report as a recommendation.

Apathy plagues UMass student government

By JEFF CLEARY
Collegian Staff

Two million dollars and who gets to play with it?

This is the problem of student government. Every student here pays $112.50 each year that goes into the Student Activities Trust Fund. This money pays for things like Southwest Week, all concerts, House Council events, the rugby and crew teams, several RSOs, and many more things students do to have fun.

News Analysis

The Commission of Student Governance has worked many hours over the last four months to try and solve the problems of the SGA. They have a new structure that may solve some of the problems of the old senate but there are many fundamental reasons for the failure of student government to serve students.

For any governing body there must be a willingness of the governed to participate. This campus is the antithesis of this. Picking on the SGA is the favorite pastime of Collegian readers, but no one from outside student government attended the commission meetings or the open forum Tuesday and when 1,700 students out of 16,000 voted in the April 9 election campaigners said it was an average turnout.

Student government needs the cooperation of the administration in order to work. However, students grew opposed to the administrators on the commission from a lack of trust. The director of SAO wrote the agenda for the commission in January while the "gang of five" did not turn to the administration until the start of the semester. During the commission meetings, the director of SAO sometimes presented an amendment by saying, "This is the way it is," when the commission had agreed to work by consensus. The vice chancellor of student affairs told Jen Wood not to run for trustee in the student-sponsored April 9 elections but informed her at noon May 7, two days before the administration's election, that there would be no election.

Voting for the referendum tomorrow may not solve the fundamental problems of student government but it may be a "step in the right direction" if sincere students run and lead students in students' concerns. And, if honest cooperation can be found with the administration, the future troubles maybe easier.

New student government said to correct Senate problems

By JEFF CLEARY
Collegian Staff

In the past, anyone who tried to get involved with student government would surely find themselves lost. But now with the a new structure going to the student body for a vote tomorrow perhaps student government will again serve students.

The Commission on Student Governance — made up of faculty, administrators and students — has worked all semester to form a structure that will alleviate the problems of the old Senate format.

So, for the many confused students who deal with student government, this guide might explain what the new Undergraduate Student Association will comprise.

● THE COUNCIL — The top of the association is a board made up of the top officers from each branch who are the recognized voice of the student body. The council meets to oversee recommendations created in the sub-committees and vote, without amending power, whether to recommend the policy or budget to the administration.

To provide access to all, council meetings include open forums to hear reports of happenings on campus. The Undergraduate Student Association assures equal access to anyone on campus and will have permanent, non-voting liaisons with students appointed from the Office of Third World Affairs, program for Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual concerns, Disability services and the Everywomen's Center. The council will also print a weekly newsletter to keep the student body informed of events in the USA.

● THE STUDENT ADVOCACY BOARD — This board has the responsibility of determining the advocacy needs of the students and to take action to help those needs. The SGA's help in defeating the Citizens for Limited Taxation proposition last semester is an example of the role of the SAB. The board also must maintain communication between several administrative offices and the USA and provide accountability of information between all parties.

There are three subcommittees under the board of advocacy:

one will deal with rents and fees campus wide, another academic problems and one to advocate for the quality of life for students at the University (Housing Services excluded). There will be an ad hoc subcommittee for any additional issues. These subcommittees will send representatives to all the University-wide committees.

● THE STUDENT ACTIVITIES TRUST FUND REVIEW COMMITTEE — Every year, each student pays $112.50 that goes into the SATF. The SATF Review Committee will recommend to the director of student activities a budget for the entire USA. The Budget and Finance subcommittee will make recommendations on allocations of monies and hear budget requests from individual groups. The Registration subcommittee will organize policy for the Registered Student Organizations.

● THE RESIDENTIAL STUDENT ASSOCIATION — The Area Government structure will not change except for the Residential committee. House councils will still be the basis of area governments and will elect officers to represent each area. The Residential committee will be replaced with five RSA officers which will serve with the AG presidents on a Residential Executive board that will coordinate the whole RSA.

● THE BOARD OF GOVERNORS — The BOG will only change from a functional to a policy forming body. The functional responsibilities will be run by Building Operations. The BOG will set policy for activities and services in the Student Union/Campus Center and allocate office space for student organizations.

Madrigal singers and Chamber Choir close out season

By KEN HASKINS
Collegian Correspondent

University Madrigal Singers and Chamber Choir
Bowker Auditorium
Sunday, May 5

The voices of the University Madrigal Singers and Chamber Choir burst forth from Bowker Auditorium Sunday afternoon in their last concert of the season.

If you are one of the people who missed it, you missed out on a great compliment to a wonderful spring day.

Singing to a sparsely seated auditorium, both groups sang pieces that even a non-choir enthusiast like myself could enjoy.

A slight spring breeze made its way through open windows as the voices of the Madrigal Singers rang out in the semi-darkness, vibrantly filling the hall with songs of spring, romantic love, and the wonders of God. Songs that brought about feelings of tranquility and well-being.

Review

There was even an element of humor as the men took the stage and sang of the consequences of women and love in a round called "'Tis Women Makes Us Love."

The women replied with a round of their own called "An Ape, A Lion."

The Chamber Choir started off with a song called "Geographical Fugue," a mixed cacophony of voices that left you wondering what was coming next.

What did come was a mixture of folk songs that made you tap your feet and strum your fingers.

The Russian song "Kalinka" contained an excellent solo by tenor Martin Maurais, and left me with visions of fur clad men drinking vodka around a roaring fire in a toast to lost loves and good times.

An emotional solo by alto Angela Paquin started "Siph Amandia," an African song complimented by a rhythm section of bongos and wood blocks.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Forge ahead before you lose momentum. Big projects are worth the risk. A partner realizes what a tremendous asset you are. Problems in a relationship will fade when you take the initiative.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): The results of a recent miscalculation are best kept under wraps. Next time, look before you leap! Steer clear of someone who gossips or has a chip on the shoulder. Be discreet.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Arrange lunch with a special chum. Although funding is available for a partnership, there could be many strings attached. Carry out your plans to make joint projects more profitable.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Everything should go according to plan now. Keep your arms modest! A long-awaited home development turns into a reality when funding suddenly becomes available. A special relationship requires fact.

LEO (July 23-Aug 22): Romantic partner may be playing for keeps. Be honest if not yet ready to settle down. A delicate situation requires lots of diplomacy. Do more yourself rather than asking others to help out.

VIRGO (Aug 23-Sept 22): Put a secret plan into operation now. A change of lifestyle will please both you and your loved ones. Be available for discussions with a special person. Do less talking and more listening.

LIBRA (Sept 23-Oct 22): A teenager will do you proud. Indulge an urge to dazzle your loved ones. A party could have interesting repercussions. Be wise enough to keep your emotions in check. Curb extravagant gestures.

SCORPIO (Oct 23-Nov 21): Special person wishes they could be with you during stressful hours. Hugs a plenty will make up for lost time. Gemini figures prominently.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov 22-Dec 21): Engage in lively discussions but sidestep arguments with your coworkers. Complete unfinished business before beginning a new project. Domestic affairs continue to demand your attention.

CAPRICORN (Dec 22-Jan 19): Grumbling is counterproductive. Settle down at work and do a good job. You will need roller skates to do everything you want to accomplish today! Sidestep any arguments with your romantic partner.

AQUARIUS (Jan 20-Feb 18): Make economic security a top priority. Your abilities receive long-over-due recognition. A financial question needs an immediate answer. The extension of credit can be a bargaining chip.

PISCES (Feb 19-March 20): Employment opportunities abound. Your experience will help you make it to the top. Concentrate on making money for yourself for a change. New investments look very promising. Forge ahead.

Sunsplash provides refreshment at Katina's

By JOHANN-HANZ VON KESSEL
Collegian Correspondent

Reggae Sunsplash
Katina's
Saturday, May 4

It may sound like a cliche, but the Springsplash at Katina's was very refreshing and synergetic. Freddie McGreggor was the main billing even though the ever domineering Mickey Dread made that seem irrelevant, pushing himself to the limit at the people's request.

Loose Caboose was the preluding act, playing original songs that came as a surpise to the big crowd of Jamaicans who never heard of them before. All these people came to see the biggies and were impressed by the locals performance.

The show began very late. As we witnessed people coming with enthusiasm ready for this event, they angrily replied with disgust for the delay. It was obvious that everybody was eagerly awaiting for this spectacle. The announcement of the show indicated 8 p.m. It took an hour and a half to commence the proposed carnival, making it look like a typical New England hazy day, even though it was as sunny and bright as the Caribbean itself. Instead of giving us mangoes to eat they gave us sour grapes to taste.

The space distribution at Katina's is very awkward, giving you the impression that you decide the place to dance. Also it looks like you're in a riddle trying to figure the way out, for there arer so many steps going up and down. Because of this, people had a hard time taking the initiative to dance, waiting for the caudil by the name of Mickey Dread to urge them to do so. He said, "Go ahead, dance just in front of me, and show me that you really wanted to be here and truly feel our music inside your heart." Mickey commanded the attention of the crowd, and he was more than a singer — he was a dramatizer, a character, a standup comedian, a speaker, and a populist. He sang a new song from his upcoming CD, as he proclaimed he joined with laser technology. This song was particularly uplifting, conversing to our minds in the liquory dialect of patois. If I hadn't been tutored by my friend Ghid from Saint Lucia, I couldn't have comprehended the song. It is good for the crowd that reggae is an enchanting monorhythm that seducesyour soul, so you don't need to know the lyrics to realize that Jah is speaking through their hymns. Making the genre so demanded in clubs because people are searching for music that is full of life.

Freddie McGreggor came from the crowd unexpectedly, surprising and baffling the crowd of Jamaicans. I never knew we had so many Antillians in the area. Besides, the Pioneer Valley has one of the largest "born-again rastas" in the whole United States. Did he sing? Brothers and sisters, he sang like a prophet motivating the proletarian vulgo to get more involved in the communal issues that affect all of us, and sending the message that we won't be able to grow spiritually unless we contribute. My gosh, the bass sounded so deep and the rhythm section sounded so heavy we had the impression they were hired to wreck the building. Even though he was messianic he didn't move people to get together in one love, one heart.

ziano and John Lombardi walked, setting up LaFlame's game-winner and Carean's insurance run RBI. LaFlame grounded to short, but was safe at first when the Minutemen could not complete the double play which would've prevented the run from scoring.

"We played lethargic baseball for 13 innings," said Northeastern coach Neil McPhee. "I'm happy we got the split."

UMass starter Darryle Corriveau only let up three runs on four hits in 5 and⅔ solid innings. Northeastern struck for two runs in the first on a Hank Gibson two-run shot which knotted the score at 2-2, and another in the third on a wild pitch.

DiSarcina scored two runs in the second game as Carelli and Dave Edwards both drove him in. Corradi and Brian Bright started the scoring for UMass with RBI base hits in the first.

The Minutemen took the first game thanks to a fine effort from pitcher Jeff Toothaker and a Bright two-run home run.

said."I think we've got a great chance...we have the talent."

Hopefully it won't end too soon, Stone said. "We have a lot of baseball left to play."

UMass must started hitting the ball, fielding the ball, and throwing the ball more consistently, or it will end very soon.

Softball crushes Adelphi

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

I would imagine that the Adelphi Panthers are awfully happy that they don't have to play the University of Massachusetts softball team until next year.

UMass (35-11) and Adelphi have met up five times this season and UMass is 5-0, outscoring the Panthers 27-4 in those games.

Yesterday UMass, No. 20 in the nation and No. 1 in the north, continued to get the strong pitching and run production they have gotten all season as they won 7-0, 5-0.

The stars, once again, were the pitching tandem of Darlene Claffey and Holly Aprile. This was the sixth time this season that they have swept a doubleheader without allowing the opposing team to score a run.

"Both pitchers did a great job today," coach Elaine Sortino said. "They both threw good games against a good hitting team. Adelphi made some contact but they both were able to throw the big pitches when they were needed."

Aprile was dominating in game one. She struck out five, walked only one and had a no-hitter going into the seventh. The win improved Aprile's record to 16-6 and lowered her ERA to 1.16.

Offensively UMass busted out of a mini-slump they were in over the weekend. Catcher Sherri Kuchinskas, fresh off being named Atlantic 10 player of the week, hit three doubles and knocked in a run. Kuchinskas batted .533 last week and after yesterday's performances her average is .335, way up from the .273 she was batting 10 days ago.

UMass got on the board in the second when Kuchinskas and Bonnie Schilling hit back to back doubles, to give UMass a 1-0 lead. In the third Amy Cockley led off with the first of her two triples in the game. Not to be outdone, Cherrie DellAnno tripled to right-center, knocking Cockley in. Aprile then doubled to center to bring DellAnno home.

In the fifth Rachel Lawson led off with a single and advanced to third when Schilling got on by an error on the Adelphi third baseman. Cockley hit a sacrifice fly to left, to bring Lawson in. Jen Miller knocked Schilling across the plate with a single.

It was more of the same in game two as Claffey (19-5) shut down Adelphi. Claffey survived a bases loaded jam in the seventh to perserve her 15th shutout of the season. Her ERA is now 1.07.

Kuchinski and Barb Marean led the show at the plate for UMass. Marean went 3-3 with three doubles and 2 RBI, while Kuchinski continued her perfect day going 3-3, all on singles.

The Minutewomen got all the runs that Claffey would need in the first. DellAnno led of with a single and advanced to second on a Miller sacrifice. Marean cracked a double to score DellAnno and then was knocked in by a Peggy Bush single.

In the third Marean and Aprile lead off with back-to-back doubles making the score 3-0. Aprile and advanced to third on a Kuchinski infield hit, who then went on to steal second. Chris Collins tried to squeeze Aprile in, but the play was a failure as Aprile was out at the plate. Kuchinski eventually scored on an error by the Adelphi shortstop on a Schilling grounder.

"This was an easier game than I expected," Sortino said. "Adelphi is a good hitting team and I was weary of us being flat. I was scared that we would be looking past Adelphi [to the A-10s], but we stayed focused and I am pleased with that.

"Right now we need to stay ready for the A-10s and we have to show up to play. The opportunity to defend our title should be a motivating enough force to make us play well."

Baseball denied sweep by Huskies

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

Until the seventh inning of yesterday's second baseball game against Northeastern, the University of Massachusetts was enjoying the perfect afternoon. Then the Huskies had to go and spoil it.

Having won the first contest against the Huskies 8-3 and holding a 4-3 lead with two outs and top relief pitcher Ron Villone on the mound, it looked like the Minutemen would clinch an over .500 regular season and the 1,000th win in team history.

That's when Huskie shortstop Lenny LaFlame stepped to the plate. LaFlame fouled off five two-strike pitches before drawing a walk. He then scored the tying run off Jim Caeran's RBI single, then knocked in the winning run in the ninth inning as the Huskies earned a come-from-behind 6-4 win yesterday at Earl Lorden Field.

"We blew the ballgame, basically," mused head coach Mike Stone. "We let up some walks, we didn't capitalize and the ninth hitter in their batting order (LaFlame) beat us."

Despite the Huskies' late-game heroics, UMass had their chances at sweeping the twin bill and picking up the program's 1,000th win. But the Minutemen left runners in scoring position in the seventh and eighth innings — the latter involving a controversial interference call on UMass shortstop Glen DiSarcina.

With one out in the eighth, John Carelli grounded to second and DiSarcina slid hard into second base — and LaFlame — to prevent the double play. The home plate umpire called interference on DiSarcina, ending the inning and provoking angry reactions.

Stone, who showed much restraint in discussing the call with the umpire crew, downplayed the call's importance in UMass' loss.

"I don't think it really matters because we had other chances to win," he noted. "However," he added, "the (NCAA baseball) rule on interference is ambiguous."

After a scoreless eighth, the Huskies plated two to seal the victory. Tim O'Connell led with a single off Rob Gra-

UMass to play final home game

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

After a topsy-turvy year for the University of Massachusetts baseball team, today's game against Central Connecticut (3:00pm) gives the team one last chance to break the mark of .500, win their one thousanth game, and for seniors Mike Tobin, Ian Torres and Dave Edwards, play their final home game at Earl Lorden Field.

The Minutemen (23-23-1) play a tough Central Conn. team that beat them earlier in the year, 1-0. Jim Telgheder allowed only four hits in that game for UMass, but a late inning home run cost him the game. UMass has more to play for than just revenge, however; they must play for consistency and confidence.

Neither of the three players, played the full four years under coach Mike Stone. Mike Tobin began playing baseball after playing football his first two years

"I walked on my sophomore year," Edwards said. "It's been a good experience, but it's had some ups and downs, just like everything else."

"I started two years after transferring from St. Peter's College. I'm from Northhampton, so my parents will be there at tomorrow's game."

UMass plays in the Atlantic-10 tournament in bustling Boyertown, Pennsylvania. UMass is scheduled for a 4:05PM game on Friday against Penn State, a team that started at a snail's pace, but have won their last ten games in a row.

This year has been highly inconsistent for the team, according to Stone. UMass has struggled recently; they've lost three of their last four ball games, and at times have looked horrendous in the field, making six errors in the field against Rutgers.

Conversely, the UMass team has been absolutely dominant at times, defeating even the stiffest competition with little problem. This has been accomplished with perfect defense, excellent starting pitching, and clutch offense.

Coach Stone said he hopes his team will play consistently enough to win three straight games and take the conference title and automatic bid in the NCAA tournament.

The trio of departing seniors share this hope also, wanting to go out as winners.

"It is pretty sad, but that's all right," Torres said. "I hope it's not the end. I want us to win the Atlantic-10, and go to regionals."

"I'd like to see us win the Atlantic-10," Edwards

MSP: 300 to 400 profs may be fired this year

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

Between 300 and 400 professors may be fired by July 1 due to the state's budget crisis, the Massachusetts Society of Professors projected in a press release yesterday.

"Something drastic has got to happen," said John Cole, president of the MSP, the professors' union. "There's either going to have to be massive layoffs, or the University is going to run out of money and close down."

The MSP has proposed an alternative plan to cutting the professors.

They have urged the administration to fire no one, and instead to open for the fall semester as if nothing was wrong.

By pretending that there is no financial crisis, the University would probably run out of money sometime early in the Spring. The MSP's response is to send the students home, and hope to reopen in Fall 1992.

This plan to "postpone the disaster" has several advantages over layoffs, according to the MSP, which asserts:

- It permits the University to be true to its mission, and to serve its overcharged students fully until the final moment.
- It gives the University time to campaign for the one-cent sales tax surcharge, whose revenues (if any) would not appear until the spring. It gives the teachers and the entire University a slim lease on life in case the state's financial picture should improve in the next few months.
- It allows more than 30 days for faculty and librarians to relocate and find new employment.
- It gives professors who cannot find other work a bridge of maximum unemployment from the day of closing until a possible reopening in September 1992.
- It might allow for some due process in making the cuts. The MSP asks, "How rational can any process be that must dismantle an enormous institution in three weeks?"
- It leaves the structure of the institution intact and partially recuperable as long as possible, whereas immediate firings will only bring about an immediate and irrevocable collapse.
- It provides time to advise students of the situation, and to help them transfer.
- It promises a demonstration of the effects of Weld's "idiocy."

"It's a simple choice, really, either fire a lot of people, or close down," Cole said.

Provost O'Brien could not be reached for comment in reaction to the plan yesterday.

MTV threatens Jhally with lawsuit

Says professor's documentary violates copyright laws

By ALISON BUCKHOLTZ
Collegian Staff

Six years ago, when communications Professor Sut Jhally conceived "Dreamworlds," his video documentary relating images of women in rock video to implications in the real world, he anticipated copyright problems — but not the lawsuit-threatening letter from MTV he received two months ago.

"I didn't think MTV would be that stupid," Jhally said, dismissing their threat on the basis of copyright laws which protect teaching material. "If it comes to trial, I'll get publicity I couldn't have bought, and the tape will be distributed to an even wider audience."

Jhally, who studies popular culture and advertising, uses 45 minutes of MTV footage from over 165 different rock videos in "Dreamworlds: Desire/Sex/Power in Rock Video." Its purpose, he said, is "to show people the connection between images in rock videos and sexual violence."

MTV disagrees. On March 25, in a letter addressed to Jhally and Chancellor-President Duffey, MTV Networks (MTVN) warned Jhally that his use of the MTV logo and footage "constitutes a violation of federal and state laws." Furthermore, it "infringes MTVN's copyright, trademark and other rights..."

In the standard cease-and-desist order, MTVN demanded that Jhally stop using MTV logos and clips, destroy all "Dreamworlds" tapes, and recall hundreds of videos from distribution.

Jhally has since expanded his attempt to distribute "Dreamworlds." "The least of my worries is legal," he said. "I would welcome a case that would clarify these issues, involving images that are public, though they're privately owned. It would set the precedent in this area."

Jhally is seeking legal counsel through teachers' unions. His defense lies within the Fair Use Provision of copyright laws, which "allows use of images for purposes of commentary, criticism, review, teaching, and research," he said. "I also meet the four conditions for fair use."

The conditions, only one of which must be met, ask if the purpose of the work in question is educational or commercial, if the original material is already in the public realm, if a disproportionately large segment of the published work is used, and if secondary distribution of the work hurts original sales.

Jhally defends his case on all four counts, especially the first. Although he charges $100 to institutions that request the video and $50 to individuals, he gives out many tapes for free.

Galbraith says US plays now, pays later

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

The decade-long domination of American politics and economics by Republicans Ronald Reagan and George Bush have led the United States to pursue current pleasures at the cost of a sound economic future, economist John Kenneth Galbraith said last night.

Galbraith, professor emeritus of economics at Harvard University, spoke about the economic policies of the 1980s and the future of the U.S. economy before a standing-room only audience in Memorial Hall.

"One should be careful about predicting the future," Galbraith said. "One safe exception that allows people to predict occurs when, in substantial measure, the future has already arrived.

"One can now speak with some confidence, for the future has already become the present," Galbraith said. "Reagan's economics and politics, as if by their own momentum, have continued."

Describing the Reagan era's "economics of contentment," Galbraith said the federal government spent more money than it took in to provide luxuries such as lower taxes, higher personal incomes, and the purchase of consumer goods from foreign nations.

The result was that many of the wealthy in this country were able to invest money in commercial real estate and the stock market, he said. But funds were drained from productive investment in industry and personal housing, he said.

"The loose money in the economy set forth a reckless number of mergers, leveraged buy-outs, and junk bonds," Galbraith said.

"We can take it as a viable rule that those who lend money have more money than those who don't," Galbraith said, referring to the fact that many of the Reagan-Bush economic policies have benefited those on the upper rungs of the economic ladder. Unfortunately, he said, this has become an important part of the American political structure. "For eight years, Mr. Reagan and now Mr. Bush, have presided over an American electorate, the voting majority of which was satisfied with its position," Galbraith said. "In the past, governments have had to placate a majority that was discontented with its social and economic position," he said. "Such oppressed, poor and discontented people exist in this country, but many have given up on voting.

"It is no longer in the interests of politicians to seek out these people's votes."

The class-based politics of the 1980s are largely a result of the economic theories which Reagan and now Bush have used to form their policy agendas, he said. Although many people lost jobs during the past decade, he said dominant current economic theories dictate that the government should play as small a role as possible in the economy.

"Government intervention in, or regulation of, the economy, was seen as not only economically unsound, but morally suspect," Galbraith said. "No direct action was taken, because this would have interrupted the comfortable and contented attitude."

Galbraith was critical of this so-called laissez-faire, or hands off, approach to handling the U.S. economy. The result was a widespread intolerance of any government regulation of private wealth, causing such problems as the Federal Savings and Loan Crisis.

"There was a complete commitment to monetary incentives," Galbraith said. "This held that the rich needed more money to spur them to release their energies, and the poor felt the spur of their own poverty."

Although the past two administrations have attemp-

Students vote today on government

'Yes' vote would replace old SGA structure

By ALEX DERING
Collegian Staff

Undergraduate students will vote today to decide whether to accept the Commission on Undergraduate Student Governance's proposed plan for a new student government.

A "yes" vote would replace the old form of student government, which has been criticized by some as inefficient, with the commission's partially completed model.

The plan for a new government — which is still incomplete — would consist of a student council which would oversee two new branches: the Student Activities Trust Fund Review Committee and the Student Advocacy Board.

The SATF Review Committee would plan budgets for the student government and recommend monetary allocations. The Student Advocacy Board will set policy for student issues, such as security and housing problems.

"This is an opportunity for the students to say that they support continuing working to improve the governmental structure through the commission," said Jo-Anne Vanin, vice chancellor for student affairs.

"This is still just a model; a lot needs to be worked out and a yes vote is saying that we should keep at it," she said.

The Commission on Undergraduate Student Governance, made up of students and administrators, was formed Feb. 11 when several leaders of the Student Government Association asked the administration to help restructure student government.

Some students feel the referendum is an administrative attempt to destroy student empowerment. A flyer signed by fifteen student leaders claims the commission was "set up by the Whitmore administration" and accuses the administration of wanting to shut down the Legal Services Office, which is the students' "only source of free legal advice."

Susan Gordon, the chairperson of the Board of Governors and one of the people who signed the flyer, said the referendum was not generated by the undergraduate senate or the student body and is unconstitutional according to the Student Government Association constitution.

After 25 years at UMass Holocaust scholar retires

By DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

"Our only hope will lie in the frail web of understanding of one person for the pain of another."
— John Dos Passos, December 1940

David Wyman, Holocaust scholar and a professor of history, is retiring this semester after 25 years at the University of Massachusetts. Author of the book, The Abandonment of the Jews: America and the Holocaust, 1941-45, which attracted critical acclaim from around the world when it was first published in 1984, Wyman is a slow-talking, calm, uncommon Christian scholar who has specialized in Jewish history.

The book was on The New York Times bestseller list for five weeks after it was published, collected numerous prizes and awards, and to date has sold an unexpected 100,000 copies.

The Abandonment of the Jews is an intensive, detailed indictment of the failure of the United States to adequately respond to the plight of the European Jews, who were being exterminated by Adolf Hitler's death camps during World War II.

The U.S. government, Wyman discovered, as well as the American Press and much of the country, turned their backs on the dying Jews, even though Washington, for a time, was aware of Hitler's "Final Solution."

Abandonment of the Jews took Wyman 10 years to research and another four to write. He could not find someone to finance his book and had to invest about two years' salary to complete his work.

Despite these setbacks, Wyman visited more than 60 archives and performed countless interviews to find the necessary information for the book which The New York Times Book Review called "shocking, disturbing, and unforgettable."

On finding government documents, Wyman said, "if you persist, you can get a lot of stuff out of our government, including things that make it look negative."

The reason for his dedication to this topic remains, even to Wyman himself, a mystery. Yet he feels this tragedy transcends all ethnic divisions.

"It's more than a Jewish issue, of course," Wyman said. "It's a human tragedy. So it involves all of us."

His publisher told him not to expect his book to sell more than 12,500 copies. To date, it has sold a 100,000, in English, German and French. Wyman attributed this success to a skyrocketing interest in Holocaust studies since 1980.

Recently, survivors of the Holocaust have contributed a great deal of work — plays, documentaries, books, and films. Also, commemorations are now held all over the world, conferences are organized, and museums and memorial archives built.

"It has become an area of a lot of interest and activity in the past 10 to 15 years," he said.

Survivors, as they get older, have discovered that they wish to preserve their first-hand knowledge of the horror of Nazi death camps, he said. "Jews recognize in general that this is a danger for Jews and they want to do what they can to see that it's not forgotten," Wyman said.

He also justified this late re-birth of interest by the recent availability of archival records, the "basic raw material" of research.

Wyman explains this "time-lag" by noting that many people, survivors and onlookers alike, need a "passage of time" before they can confront such a tragedy.

Still, he says we can not forget about the Holocaust and that it will always remain embedded deeply in the back of our minds, clawing at our collective conscience.

Wyman compares the sudden resurgence of interest in the Civil War to that of the Holocaust. Both are deep "psychic" wounds of humanity, he said, and we are "never done with it."

"The Holocaust is one of a limited number of historical events that people recognize, I think with out even thinking about it, that is so significant that it has to be dealt with," he said.

"That six million people were systematically eliminated just because they belonged to a particular religious group, children and old people and everybody, and civilized society could do that, plan it and do it, and the rest of civilized society when they learned about it, didn't raise every possibility they could to interfere — that's just an overwhelming fact. It'll keep coming up."

ted to justify their policies through ascribing them to established economic theory, Galbraith sees it differently.

These policies "were all a front for getting a few more tax dollars for the rich," Galbraith said.

As he did frequently throughout his talk, Galbraith used humor to make his points. He said: "If you feed a horse enough oats, some will pass to the road for the sparrows."

Galbraith was referring to the widely-held theory of "trickle-down" economics, which held that if the rich were given more money, it would stimulate the economy and provide jobs and income for middle and lower-class workers.

Though the United States is currently in the depths of recession, Galbraith said he believes it is not yet time to panic.

"The U.S. remains by a wide margin, the world's greatest economic entity," Galbraith said, noting the high quality of American universities, civil service, financial institutions, and research capabilities.

However, if people in this country continue to pursue private gain at the expense of the public good, the results will be felt far beyond the borders of the United States. "The shadow of unemployment, recession, and uncertain government will tend to spread out to the rest of the world," Galbraith said.

Students urged to wear armbands in support of public education

By MARC ELLIOT
Collegian Staff

A coalition of students, faculty and staff are encouraging those attending graduation this spring to wear white arm bands to show their support for public education.

A long-range 'political action committee' created during the professors' two-day job action last month will distribute arm bands made out of white crepe paper at the commencement May 26.

"The arm bands are meant as a symbol of solidarity for stable and sufficient funding for the University and public education," said a committee member, Robert Rothstein, a professor in the Slavic Languages department.

There is a lot of support in Massachusetts for raising taxes for a cause like public education, Rothstein said. "We're hoping this is one way to make this support visible," he said.

Leaflets will be handed out with the arm bands encouraging people to call or write to Gov. Weld and their state legislator and express support for public education on all levels, according to committee member and student Ken Parker.

"Anyone who is going to graduation should pick up a white arm band and protest the cuts," Parker said.

The committee is also sponsoring a letter writing campaign with form letters advocating stable funding for public higher education. The letters can be obtained on the Campus Center Concourse this Monday through Wednesday, Parker said.

More information will also be available on how to get involved in the fight for public higher education, such as carpooling to lobby at the State House, he said.

■ MTV vs. the professor

"I've subsidized a lot of expenses out of my own pocket, and profits go to an educational trust fund in the communications department," he said. "I pointed this out to MTV when I wrote them back, along with a reminder of their anti-censorship stance."

Jhally's other defenses are just as strong. "Clearly, the rock video material is widely available," he said. In addition, "MTV would have to show that my 45-minutes worth of footage is extreme, considering they're on the air 24 hours a day, 365 days a year. My use is a small percentage."

The main function of these videos is advertising, Jhally said, noting that his screenings don't have the ability to hurt sales of the original videos. "MTV's video images are given out for free" to cable subscribers, he said. "Controlling these images isn't a money issue. The primary function is selling records."

A clerical worker in the President-Chancellor's office said the University is also seeking counsel, but declined comment.

Though Jhally's use of the tapes may ultimately fall within constitutional limits, MTV has more at stake than copyrights or trademarks — namely, a bruised image.

"The MTV logo is used all the time," said Nancy Altman, MTVN's Director of Legal and Contract Administration. "But it's rarely this horrible...it is risque to use [MTV's name] in this context because of the nature of the video."

The nature of "Dreamworlds" revolves around images of rape and the outlook that fosters it, Jhally said. It takes its name from the perception of rock videos as adolescent male fantasies encouraging objectification of and violence toward women.

Its purpose is two-fold, Jhally said. "I try to get people to re-examine images [of women] they see as innocent and natural, and then see how these images impact behavior in the real world. The images themselves don't lead to rape, but they are connected to attitudes that do."

Advertising, rather than MTV, is Jhally's true target. The problem "is not just rock video images," he said. "These are the kinds of images you see in advertising everywhere."

Instead, Jhally believes that this is a teaching issue. "I have to show [the video clips] to teach about them," he said. "The fact that I made a videotape is a problem for MTV, no matter what I do with it."

What Jhally did with it was on too small a scale for MTV to be worried, he said. Beginning last September, when he finished editing the fourth and final version of "Dreamworlds," he distributed it through various communications societies.

"I concentrated on videotape libraries, university departments, women's centers, residence halls, awareness-training groups, and fraternities," he said. "I targeted educational programs. They're the ones who need to see it."

Jhally has "a very limited aim: for people who watch rock videos to say, 'Maybe this has to do with sexual violence. Maybe this does have to do with the real world.' I hope I problematize images that people would otherwise think are natural," he said. Andrea Kandel, the director of the UMass Center for Diversity and Development in Southwest, agrees with the effectiveness of Jhally's academically-oriented approach. "'Dreamworlds' is good to use for gender workshops and parent workshops," she said. "We would miss a powerful documentary if it were withdrawn."

There is no chance of this, he said. Large corporations "use their 'bigness' to threaten someone who has something to lose," he said. "But I have nothing to lose. I hope they sue me. I have no assets. It's easier for an individual to take this on."

He also welcomed the issue for the precedent a case judged in his favor would set in the academic world. "If I had to fight this case for any academic field, I would choose the video to do it," he said. "But it would also set a precedent for print. I've gone to advertisers for copyright permission when I wanted to include images in scholarly articles, and have been denied by Calvin Klein, by tobacco companies, by alcohol companies."

Their reasons were similar to MTV's. "It's all public relations," Jhally said. "They want to forestall criticism, which is more effective when you can see what you criticize."

To settle the case, Jhally would be "quite happy" to remove MTV's logo from the first thirty seconds of "Dreamworlds" if that was all his antagonists demanded. "I'd just insert 'Censored by MTV,'" he said.

■ referendum vote today

"The structure the referendum suggested would be a very small, centralized, hierarchical structure giving power into the hands of just a few people," she said.

Gordon said the referendum vote was rushed.

"They weren't ready for planning a restructuring and when they tried to tackle it they didn't realize they'd bitten off more than they could chew until it was too late," she said.

Vanin said she realizes there are students who oppose the restructuring efforts and hopes the referendum will "provide the administration with a clear student opinion."

Informed opinions are essential if the referendum is to be a true reflection of what the students want, she said, urging students to seek a variety of information about the issue before voting.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

Columnist reviews his life at UMass in a farewell column

Gentle Reader:

It is with great regret that I hereby declare my retirement as a newspaper columnist. Unlike many of my Collegian colleagues, I am not a journalism major and after my impending graduation I have no intention of getting a newspaper job. My humble goal as a columnist has been to talk to you, my readers, in order to amuse you, spark your varying interests and elicit feedback on many intriguing concepts which I hope to explore at a later time. Each of my columns has been on a different topic. It is very difficult to chain you down and make you read an entire column, but I have done my best to keep you interested. To those of you who stayed with me, I thank you.

I have tried not to write inside jokes nor to waste my precious space on personal issues. HOWEVER, I have never in my four years received a personal. So I figured my last column would list the plethora of memories collected since that first awkward weekend in September 1987. I know this is high school-esque but it's my space and I'm graduating, so I can do what I want.

In the genre of Billy Joel, I herewith list the friends, enemies, roommates, lovers, parties, games, drinks, classes, professors and other memories with helped make my college career a living hell:

Freshman year: Patti Warden, Jim Barifaldi; Honors Weekend: Todd Welsh, Risk, Debbie Brown, Ron Rezendes, Southern Comfort, Alexis Greenblatt, Tammy Alconada, Four North Field: Veronica Welch, Matt Gershoff; John Shea's writing class: Jen Gibbs, Peter X.W.F. Clines, Hearts and Pitch, Professor Meeks bought Pizza for us at the review session, Bruce Wisenburn, missing the Flying Karamazov Brothers for a COINS exam, John Penn, Juggling Club, my first and only time on Dean's List, riding Todd's scooter at precarious speeds downhill, and the Beatles.

Mark B. Adler

Sophomore year: Honda Accord, Sandy Smith, Chris Lathan, Kris Bruno, Regan Rosenfeld, Khaleelah Abdul-Kareem, Multi-'vitamin' Calculus, Rodney Dangerfield teaching Linear Algebra, Field House Council, Julius Lester, getting an INComplete, Judaic Studies minor, being kicked out of the Honors program, dropping my Math major in favor of being undeclared, Interesession, living with Lisa, being an R.A. on Seven South Grayson (Hell), playing Capture-the-flag in the dorms before the residents arrive, Flat Street, Nadja Sodos, Stop & Shop at 3 a.m., history major, Judaic Studies T.A., Grand Poobah of Grayson, and Leigh-Ann Schwartz.

Junior year: R.A. on Seven South Field (loads of fun), Allison Hart Smith, dealing with girfriends, Louis Greenbaum, staying up late gossiping, two all-nighters for no good reason, Dean Ware, R.A. II class was awful and so were staff meetings, getting back in Honors, David Wyman, love of history, New Year's Day 1990 was my 21st Birthday, living with Dave Sternala, Deb Yegerlehner, Stumpy, Golden Doughnut, B.O.G., Car Crash, Every Tuesday and Sunday at the Northampton Brewery, driving 30 hours to Miami, Twinkie Break, Disney World, King of the Concourse, Kevin Snow, Axis and Allies, Holocaust Memorial Week, Sharon Majewski, fencing, Adrian and Alisa (I forgot their last names), and Anjana Thatte.

I hope all of you are taking notes. There will be a quiz.

Senior year: Summer in Amherst Puffer's Pond, Hillel House, Mike Selzer and Laura Silver, 'der schtuppen,' free R.A. on two South Field (the best floor), pizza pizza with Hiza Hiza, Facilities Coordinator, quitting the B.O.G., being in love, columnist, weekend at the Marriot, Milton Cantor and the New York Times, Bill Harris, the Sung Dynasty, still lurking about, Interesession with Ron and Laurie, Sign Language, applying to (and being rejected from) grad schools, heartbreak hotel.

Thank you all for spending this year with me and my columns. I would greatly appreciate your opinions on my columns. Mail them to 221 Field or 113 Campus Center.

Bye y'all!

A letter to campus about commission

The Commission on Undergraduate Student Governance has worked long and hard this spring to recommend a new governance structure for undergraduate students on this campus. While the student, faculty, and administrative representatives on the commission have put forth a number of good ideas, they were not able to present a completed proposal to the campus by the May 1 deadline. As a result, neither the student body nor the administration has had sufficient time to review and understand the outline of the proposed governance structure that will appear in the referendum on May 9.

Because undergraduate student governance is so important, we are taking steps to avoid making a premature decision. These steps are:

- The referendum on the proposed outline of a governance structure will be held today, with the understanding that further review and development by both the student body and the administration is necessary;
- We will recommend that the President's Office recognize the April 9, 1991, election of Student Trustee Kevin Newnan;
- We will recognize David Gagne as interim president of the Student Government, based on the election of April 9;
- We will meet with Trustee Newnan and Interim President Gagne during the summer to continue to address the issues of the structure of undergraduate student governance on this campus.

As interim vice chancellor for student affairs, I will be responsible for working with Trustee Newnan and Interim President Gagne on issues of student governance and other issues of concern to the undergraduate student body. Meetings with these two student officers will begin as soon as possible.

While we regret that the May 9 referendum does not present to the student body a completed and reviewed structure, we believe the above actions will ensure a student voice and encourage continued progress toward a more effective structure of student governance.

Undergraduate students' opinions on the viability of the structure outlined in the referendum are important. Please vote today.

Jo-Anne Thomas Vanin
Interim Vice-Chancellor for Student Affairs

Student discusses political correctness at the university

This is yet another "political diatribe." For those who don't want to deal with it, turn the page. Those of you who do read it might be tempted to simply relegate it to the "PC" (that is, politically correct) trash can that the right-wing on this campus has so conveniently provided for us. I'd like to say a few words on the "PC" movement, both for it and against it. I can't be one of those intolerant, wild-eyed lefties, now can I? Like a good American, I always look at both sides of any issue. First, vaguely in defense of "political correctness."

Item: A handful of would-be intellectuals on this campus call themselves APC, or anti-politically correct, in order to preserve what they consider to be traditional American values manifested in their modern forms, even though these modern forms may be even more deceiving. For example, the APCers might say America is aland whose ruling classes respect multiculturalism, diversity, freedom, etc. I don't even want to go into Bush's record on these issues. Despite the highfalutin rhetoric of his commencement speech at the University of Michigan (see the New York Times, May 5), Bush's record on human rights here and around the world is, quite frankly, putrid.

Item: Again utilizing the ever-present "Hitler" tactic that they know can strike an emotional nerve, neoconservatives are fond of decrying "political correctness" as the new fascism on college campuses. A couple of weeks ago, in fact, a slick national right-wing magazine (complete with a Coors beer ad on the back!) geared towards students, called Campus, appeared at several locations around UMass. The cover of the trendy mag featured a "PC" professor with a visage dark and demonic enough to scare the daylights out of anyone entertaining even remote notions of vocalizing "bad" (read: rightist) thoughts. Incidentally, he was also wearing a Gestapo-style uniform, and on the requisite armband where a swastika should have been emblazoned were — you guessed it! — the letters "PC." Now to me this would be laughable if it weren't so dangerously devious. Using Nazi imagery to trivialize the views of those who have usually been anti-fascist — when they could recognize fascism, that is — is nothing more than outright duplicity.

Roger Long

Item: The April 22 and 29 issues of Newsweek had editorials by conservative intellectual George Will lambasting what he called "tenured radicals" as "sixties retreads." Why? Because professors are no longer engaging in the dispassioned, "objective" discourses they used to. When? Why, during the McCarthy era no doubt! Any threat to the establishment, real or perceived, is definite cause for alarm by the likes of George Will, William F. Buckley, Pat Buchanan, etc. It's no coincidence that campuses, a certain source of grief in the sixties for the powers-that-were, are an important corporate target now.

The real message from the establishment is: currently we're quite paranoid and we'll do anything to take your mind off your politics. And if we can't simply erase history we'll co-opt the most uncomfortable parts of it and sell it back to you in much diluted (read: depoliticized) form. The same status-quo ideology is used to tell us that workers in eastern Germany are so mired in primitivism and reaction that they can't see the logic of accepting 50 percent unemployment rates so that capitalism can be fully restored there. God, the nerve of those crazy workers!

When the right appropriates the vocabulary of the left, the purpose is to confuse, deceive, and de-intellecutalize, and regrettably it often has its intended results.

OK- now a few words against the "PC" movement. I'm not "politically "correct." "PC" is just a 90s word for "liberal" and once again the establishment has been successful in stealing and denigrating (read: co-opting) a term that originated with the left during the dark decade of Reaganism. So when people in the "PC" movement refuse to address and condemn classism, imperialism, racism, sexism, and homophobia — direct and indirect — for fear of being labeled out of the mainstream, they aren't contributing to a solution. They are sweeping problems under the rug. And when problems are swept under the rug it's all too painful to watch the social refuse that inevitably emerges, not least among which are George Bush et al, the Minuteman (partially funded by student money), Campus, and their respective staffs. To quote one of the many "sixties retreads" slogans, when the "PC" movement refuses to confront the right bu only tolerates it, it's not part of the solution, but part of the problem.

Yet we on the left have something to look forward to: by attacking the liberals, the right is going after the wrong target. That's okay, Minuteman staff, the liberals on campus will tolerate you. You have nothing to worry about. But for the left, it's time to expose and confront the liars: at UMass, in Boston, in Washington, and everywhere else. The time for fence sitting is over.

Many changes may be on the horizon in the Lebanon area

For 16 long and painful years the stench of death has hung over Lebanon. In many ways, however, this past week has been the one of the greatest hope that the beleagured citizens of this once prosperous land have experienced since the onset of war in 1975.

The hope, while cautious, is palapable. Leading newspapers have been epressing the mood of public optimism. As-Safir wrote that "The countdown for the ending of the misery and suffering during the past 16 years of civil war has begun." And An-Nahar declared that "An era of hope has begun."

Hussein Ibish

What has prompted this uncharacteristic optimism in a land where hopes have been shattered with monotonous regularity is the attempt by the Lebanesse army to extend its "control" over much of the country. Since the Gulf war, when the United States, France and Israel gave the Syrian occupation forces permission to crush the uprising of nationalistic, but quite mad, General Michel Aoun, the nation has been firmly divided between zones of Syrian and Israeli occupation.

The Syrians, who control most of the country, also have effective control of the government of President Elias Hrawi. This government has been attempting to implement the Taif agreement which provides for a reform of the sectarian distribution of power. The main aim of this plan, and indeed any plan for peace in Lebanon, relies on a disbanding of the rival militias that have conducted the civil war. When the accord was concluded two years ago, few took the goal date of May 1, 1991 seriously.

To universal surprise, the army has moved out beyond the greater Beirut area, which was purged of militias in late 1990, into much of the rest of the country. Almost unthinkably, some of the various militias have been surrendering arms, including the Maronites, 10,000 strong "Lebanese Forces," and the "Giant" militia of Sulieman Franjieh, as well as Shi'ite Amal and Druze PSP militias. Still, the cooperation is far from universal.

Palestinian groups have argued that they are not militias, but part of an army of national liberation, and therefore must be excluded from the disarming. However true that may be, they cannot possibly be allowed to remain as they are now — small local armies. In an effort to make the point, eight Palestinain fighters are on trial for illegal weapons possession. The obvious and valid question: 'Who will protect us?' can be asked by every group.

Another very recalcitrant group is the pro-Iranian Hisbullah. Syria and Iran recently agreed that they could remain an armed presence in the south and in the eastern Bekka region. Even if these groups could be brought into a completed disarming process, serious problems remain. A lasting solution of the Lebanese national collapse requires an unlikely mix of internal and external factors.

In truth, the Lebanese inferno has been ignited by combustible elements, both domestic and foreign. If foreign hands clicked the flint together, the sparks fell on a tinderbox of internal contradictions, laced with imperial French gasoline. A solution cannot be unilaterally imposed from the outside, as both Syria and Israel have discovered. Similarly, outside forces can and have put a stop to internal attempts at reconciliation.

No doubt the attempt at peace that we are seeing now is the result of trilateral cooperation on the part of Syria, Israel and the United States, like a similar period in the late 1970s. But this is the central factor of its weakness. How long will outside forces restrain themselves from using Lebanon as a battlefield to wage proxy wars? Can we have any faith that all will remain calm between them, or, if not, that they will fail to find idiotic Lebanese to do their dirty work? Few Lebanese doubt that any future Israeli expansion of territory, a strong possibility, will focus on the the south with its coveted Litanni River.

The main source of hope comes from the fact that the Lebanese people as a whole are thoroughly sick of the war. They have shown unmistakable signs of repudiating their own militias and exhibit no stomach for future conflict. But, any peace imposed by foreign forces leaves one with the sense that the future is firmly in the hands of others.

Cohen advises students to vote on the proposed student government

I suppose the Kevin Kline character from the movie "A Fish Called Wanda" is the person who comes to mind when I think about student government. Not because Kline was exceptionally funny but because he had the habit of shouting "DISAPPOINTED!" at the top of his lungs when things were not working out too well. Student government has not been doing too well these days. And I must say that the administration's meddling has disappointed a lot of people. Take Jen Wood, for example. She was all set to run for student trustee, but two days before the election she was thrown aside by a frightened administration scared of a lawsuit.

This is not the first time that the administration has stabbed us in the back. After spending almost three months and at least 50 work hours on a commission to restructure student government, the administration tried to kill the whole thing by preventing the referendum from ever happening. But this attempt was thwarted and the referendum still exists for students to vote on today. I strongly urge you to vote sometime during the day. It is absolutely imperative that we get our new government off the ground and running. We are facing major cuts to the University system, from administrators to professors to lower enrollment next year, and we need a student government that can address these problems.

The old student government was a vehicle for a select few individuals to play games with $4 million of your money. The new structure proposed is going to make the student government more accountable for its actions and more focused on the needs of students on this campus. And that is all students, not just the ones with the biggest mouths. A lot of elections have been held this year and there has been a significant amount of confusion over what is and what is not legitimate. Much of the confusion can be prevented by voting for the referendum. Granted, the new structure will not competely eradicate the silliness that has been the norm these past few years, but it will put student government on the road to recovery.

The new structure works two ways: first, it is streamlined to be more efficient by slimming down the oversized and wasteful parts of the student government like the senate and the Board of Governors; and second, it expands the committee structure so that anybody who wants to participate in student government can do just that. Our old structure had "open committees," but they did little.

Most of the activity occured at the Wednesday night Senate meetings. The new structure does not even have a senate. It has a council, and the council focuses on setting goals, not making policy decisions. All the work is done within the committee structure, not within the council. And it means that what was once an organization for would-be politicians is now an accessible organization for students interested in working for students.

Vote today for a change. We do not have time to play games. There are bigger issues at stake. Vote YES in today's referendum.

A warm thank you from Sharon Lang

This is an open letter to all those people who helped out during Southwest Week. When I became vice-president of Southwest, people told me of the hell it would be and I would have a hard time getting people to help make Southwest Week '91 a success.

They said representatives would be apathetic and unsupportive and that officers would be equally uncooperative.

To the contrary, I found our representatives very helpful and eager to get involved. I found they were great to work with and finding volunteer for security was very easy.

As a result, the residents of Southwest got the Blushing Brides concert, a fun Rocky Horror Picture Show shown outside on the Horseshoe, musical entertainment from local bands, hilarious comedians from Boston, and Kevin Nealon at the Fine Arts Center.

I would like the residents of Southwest to know of the hard work it took to put on these events. Everything seemed to have run smoothly, but there were many problems we had to overcome.

Things were pretty stressful for all of us. I would like to thank my co-presidents Bonnie Crowley and Frank Martin for being so supportive and helping me when I needed it the most. Kathy MacDougall, our office manager, was there through it all and really helped me keep my sanity.

Chris Smith, our security coordinator, and his security staff, helped make this an incident-free week. I just want everyone to know while I may have the title of vice-president, and Southwest Week was my responsibility, it never would have been the success it was without all representatives, volunteers, and friends.

Fraternity's apology is simply not enough

I am glad to see the Pi Kappa Alpha fraternity apologizing for the actions of some of its members. Specifically, I am referring to Jeanne Hagarty's report of being harassed as she passed by the fraternity house. I would also like to say I am in agreement with a statement made by Mr. Tullio, that "The Greek area tends to be an easy target for stereotyping. All Pikes do not find it acceptable to scream obscenities at or harass women."

So with that said, I'd also like to say that an apology doesn't seem to change a thing. Are the perpetrators of the harassment being allowed to get off scott-free? Are they still allowed to live in the house? I would encourage the brothers of Pi Kappa Alpha to take a strong stance on this. I'm talking about mandatory written apologies from each of the perpetrators to Ms. Hagarty to be published in the Collegian. I'm talking about probationary status for the perpetrators and if they so much as think about saying more stupid, offensive things, immediate expulsion from the house and the fraternity if they don't agree to every one of the above terms, and more if the brotherhood chooses. In addition, Pi Kappa Alpha should make all their actions around this issue public knowledge. This will serve as an example to other fraternities, and the campus community, that the men of Pi Kappa Alpha, and men in general, do take this sort of issue seriously.

The brothers of Pi Kappa Alpha have a golden opportunity to help create more of the positive image Mr. Tullio attempted to delineate in his letter. Philanthropic and academic acheivement are great, and for that the brothers of Pi Kappa Alpha should be praised. But these things do not make up for, or eliminate, the sexist harassment that has occurred and continues to occur. Anything less than strong action is nothing more than acceptance of, and collusion with, the harassment.

Greek area activities do not receive coverage

On April 26-27, the brothers and pledges of Delta Upsilon pulled a chariot from the Dana Farber Cancer Institute in Boston to Amherst. The journey took two full days and covered 110 miles. We do this every year spring to raise money for the Jimmy Fund, a charity that raises money for children's cancer research. Traditionally, when we roll the chariot into our yard, we celebrate our achievement by having an outdoor concert. The money raised from the concert goes to the Jimmy Fund as well. This year, despite many obstacles set up by the University, Delta Upsilon still raised over $5,000. Yet, the only recognition we received on campus was a picture with a caption on the second page of the Collegian.

This University is a very diverse one, and the Greek Area adds to that diversity. Unfortunately, it is evident that the University does not want to acknowledge the good that the Greek Area does for the community. The fraternities and sororities in this University's Greek Area all help the community through philanthropy. There is a profound injustice in the fact that Delta Upsilon and the Greek Area works hard and is constantly put down by the Collegian and the University, while some people stand around the Student Union steps holding signs and eventually make the front page of the Collegian. Delta Upsilon and the rest of the Greek Area deserve more credit for the philanthropies that they perform and it is about time the Collegian and the University realized that.

A letter from eighty heterosexual people who will no longer be silent

I cannot keep quiet any longer! We have heard so much from the other side. I demand equal time.

Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay 'issues.' Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay Awareness Weeks. Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay rallies — demanding equal rights. Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay support groups discussing prejudice, homophobia, and exchanging stories of 'the Quilt.' The largest college daily has an editor in charge of these issues.

Ms. Skeigh, my due respect to you for a job well done. I am waiting to pick up a copy of the Collegian that does not have an article on the subject. I appreciated being informed, but I resent making these issues an overwhelming part of campus life.

I am a 23-year-old heterosexual woman, not ailing from any phobias. I always felt confident enough about my own sexuality without ever experiencing a need to prove it appropriate to anyone else. But I am fed up with others doing their own thing. Just like you, I am sure, do not want to know whether I prefer standing on my head while I have my boyfriend over on Friday night. Whatever I do, it is my own private decision which I share with a consenting partner who agrees with my particular choices. And no matter how stimulating, exciting, or controversial these choices are, by definition they are not enough to make the news!

If you feel that you are protecting the rights of a minority which experiences prejudice on campus, I can name you many other such groups that are not protected by the Collegian editors. These groups are not looking for justification for their heritage or for their choices. They are self-reliant enough and proud enough without having to yell about their lifestyle from every street corner.

So what is eating the homosexual community?: My friends and neighbors at Basics, nobody cares what you do with your spare time! But we are sick and tired of hearing about it. I beg you, stop living the teenage egocentric mentality. It is truly unbecoming!

And Ms. Skeigh, if you want to talk about issues, then let's start discussing the real ones for a change. Let's talk about Israel and the PLO. Let's talk about the break up of the Soviet Union. Let's talk about the economic unification of Europe. Let's talk about issues which should matter to us, since these issues are changing and shaping the world we are planning to enter once we leave this university. Homosexuality is simply not one of them!

At least 147 miners dead after explosion in China

The Associated Press

BEIJING — A gas explosion blamed on lax safety measures has killed at least 147 coal miners in China's worst mine accident in three decades, officials said yesterday.

The Xinhua News Agency, however, did not say exactly what caused the April 21 explosion at the government-owned Sanjiaoje Coal Mine in Shanxi Province, west of Beijing. The report also did not say why the accident was not reported until yesterday.

Many Chinese mines lack modern equipment and accidents are common. In addition to state-owned mines, tens of thousands of tiny, hand-dug mines are operated privately and illegally by peasants.

A man at the Shanxi provincial Coal Industry Bureau said all 147 miners who had signed in to go down the mine shaft at the time of the blast were thought to be dead, even though not all the bodies have been found.

The man, who identified himself only as Mr. Zheng, said he could not rule out that others were killed as well, because the explosion occurred as one shift of workers was coming out and another was going down the mine shaft.

The mine employed about 985 workers, he said.

Xinhua quoted Hu Fuguo, vice minister of energy resources, as saying the mine lacked even the most basic safety facilities. Hu said 90 percent of the workers were temporary workers with no safety knowledge or training.

Mine officials seldom went to the mine and were never vigilant about safety, Xinhua said. An accident in 1980 at the same mine killed 30 workers, said the Communist party newspaper, The People's Daily.

Official figures said about 1,780 miners were killed in accidents in 1989 alone, the last year for which statistics were published. An average of 14 miners die for every million tons of coal mined, the official Science and Technology Daily newspaper reported in May 1990.

Cellucci endorses bill for gay, lesbian teens

The Associated Press

BOSTON — Lt. Gov. Paul Cellucci endorsed a bill Tuesday that could eventually lead to school-based counseling programs for gay and lesbian teen-agers.

The bill would set up a gay and lesbian services board within the Executive Office of Human Services.

David LaFontaine, lobbying director for the Coalition for Lesbian and Gay Civil Rights, said the advisory board would be voluntary, with no additional costs to the state.

LaFontaine said the first priority would be developing ways to combat suicide among homosexual teens.

"We feel the time has come to get into the school system on a statewide basis to make sure the support is there for any gay or lesbian youth who needs it," LaFontaine said.

LaFontaine said a federal study showed that up to 30 percent of youth suicides involve conflicts over sexual orientation.

"This is like a hidden holocaust in America," he said. "What we are about is ending the silence over the issue."

Cellucci said the administation was not endorsing any specific programs for gay and lesbian teens, but added: "I think any program is going to involve some form of counseling for gay teens contemplating suicide."

Jean Genasci, Northeast coordinator for the Parents and Friends of Lesbians and Gays, said that all teen-agers face serious pressures, but they can be worse for homosexuals who do not have a support system.

PEACE, LOVE AND HAIR GREASE! WE ARE OUTTA HERE!

Thanks A Lot!

By DOUGLAS GREER
Collegian Correspondent

I would like to thank the African American professors who responded to the termination Gary Porter, the author of the not so funny comic strip "Frotjer."

The reason I would like to thank you is for the fact, that with one mighty stroke of your pen, you embarrassed African American students all over this campus by criticizing the way the students handled the situation.

Did you stop to think about what you were doing, when you submitted your column to the editorial page?

Obviously not! Well at least the African American students know where your loyalities lie.

Douglas Greer

First of all, this was not the first incident in which this idiot's comic strip was found to be offensive. Many of his strips were found to be offensive to women, and other minority groups on campus besides African Americans.

Did you ever wonder why he was fired so quickly? Surely you do not think the small amount of politically active African Americans on this campus have that much influence.

Secondly, I do not think you have the right to criticize any African American on this campus.

Outside of teaching, the African American community rarely sees you. You are rarely seen at our programs to support us, and you are never seen when a problem occurs.

Of course this does not apply to all the African American professors, but it does apply to the majority of you.

Third point: Why didn't you wait a week and submit your article to the Black Affairs page? I know for a fact there is always room on the page. Why did you go to the editorial page? Show some support for the Black Affairs page.

In conclusion I suggest the next time you want to reprimand us, at least take the time to talk to us personally.

You don't even know where we are coming from, so what makes you think you can tell us the right way to go.

Granted, we are not great civil rights leaders. We do make mistakes (the frotter incident was not one of them), but remember we are your brothers and sisters too.

Think about it!

UMOJA NOW

Come one, come all in Umoja
(unity). The time for foolish separatism, interracial ignorance and lack of representative organization is over. Congregate in Umoja now and we will walk the straight and narrow together.

We, the original people descended from
Pharos and Queens, owe it to ourselves to unite and demand our due respect on this damn campus.

The Frotter comic, Glimpses of Isreal and recent editorial attacks represent just the tip of the iceberg of all the forces on this campus that attack
our very existence. It's just raining now, but there is a storm comming soon. The time to unite is now, not out of retaliatory anger but, out of simple "We Will Survive" faith. I ask that all the brothers and sisters of the African American community come support our unified mission, same time (after A Different World), same place. We can do this.

Love, AL
(A human being)

There will be a relebration at the "Augusta Savage Art Gallery" on Tuesday May 14, in the New Afrira House Library. This is to celebrate the spirits of Dr. Richard Jones, James Baldwin and Yvonne John. All are welcome to attend.

Write for Black Affairs!

"I think we definitely finished on a high note," Carelli added. "Everybody's starting off even in Boyertown, it really doesn't matter [that we blew the lead]."

Stone disagreed.

"You gotta win these games," he said. "That's two times in a row, back to back, that we were one strike away from winning the ballgame."

■ postseason speculation

The second round, which will be played May 19, pits the top four with the winners of the first round. The semifinals and finals are played on the 25th and 27th.

The bottom Eastern team is dropped from the list in lieu of integrating Western competition into the playoff picture. Although the team closest to Baltimore usually gets the No. 11 spot, due of course to politics, Rutgers may actually get that spot this time around. The strength of Duke's schedule, however, may be its saving grace.

This year's top West pick looks to be Michigan State. If they beat Ohio State, who they are slated to play Saturday, they will boast the best win-loss record. OSU has a meager 8-7 record while MSU is at 10-4.

They have faced five common opponents in regular season. The Spartans and Buckeyes suffered losses against Ohio Weselyan with scores of 15-9 and 22-7, respectively.

MSU beat down the doors of Air Force (14-8), Canisius (17-11), Wooster (10-9) and Notre Dame (10-8). The Spartans eeked by Hobart 11-10 on April 27.

OSU had mixed results against Wooster (13-7W), Air Force (10-9L), Canisius (13-11W) and Notre Dame (11-7L).

The Spartans have also faced opponents common to UMass: Dartmouth (14-13W), Rutgers (14-2L) and Delaware (11-10ot W), but the chance of the Gorillas and Spartans meeting is scarce.

Key games last Saturday which helped to shape the list include a Brown trouncing of Cornell (11-6), a Rutgers squeak past Army (16-14) and a Johns Hopkins victory over Towson State (12-9).

Among all the games, there was only one upset. Maryland-Baltimore County, a non-ranked team, beat No. 7 Maryland-College Park 15-13.

But in other areas of the Eastern Seaboard, business was as usual. Princeton soundly beat Dartmouth 20-3, Penn State struggled over Delaware 17-11, Hofstra put away Yale 12-10, Adelphi clipped C.W. Post 14-12 and Penn predictably beat Stonybrook 19-14.

North Carolina will face Penn and Loyola will play at C.W. Post this weekend as Syracuse hosts Adelphi in the Carrier Dome, home of the NCAA Finals.

CBS will tape-delay the championship game and PRIME Network indicated it will be syndicating the semifinals from the site of the game.

Johns Hopkins will host the North-South All-Star Game June 7-8 for both Division I and III. The Lacrosse Foundation, which was based on the Johns Hopkins campus, has moved and will be dedicated that weekend.

UMass ends regular season over Central Conn for 1,000th

John Russell took the save in yesterday's 1,000th win for the Minutemen as they squeaked past Central Conn 5-4 at Lorden Field.

Minutemen leave for A-10 Tourney today

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

Well, at least you can say the regular season finale was a lot like the season in general — a stomach-churning roller-coaster ride.

The University of Massachusetts baseball team won its 1,000th game against Central Connecticut yesterday, 5-4, with three runs in the bottom of the ninth inning, after blowing a lead in the top of the ninth.

UMass (24-23-1) capped a dramatic go-from-ahead and come-from-behind victory with John Carelli crossing the plate while Central Conn first baseman Sean Garrison stood watching the baseball he dropped on an attempted pick-off play from catcher Brian Massey.

Just like yesterday's loss to Northeastern, UMass had the game in their hands and were one strike away from a win when they faltered in the top of the ninth.

Starter John Russell cruised through the first eight innings, as UMass led, 2-1, and he appeared to be finishing the job in the ninth, until he allowed a single by Patrick Smith and hit pinch hitter Kevin Farquhar with two outs and two strikes.

Adam Peters promptly singled in Smith, tying the score at two. With runners at first and third, UMass botched a delayed double steal with a bad throw by first baseman Jay Dodig, and Farquhar scored, to make it 3-2. Jason Brucker followed with an run-scoring triple to put Central Conn on top, 4-2. Ron Villone relieved Russell and got the third out with one pitch.

UMass was determined not to let the game slip away in the same manner as they did against Northeastern, however.

"We gave away the game against Northeastern, so we were pretty determined," Carelli said. "We didn't want to give another one away, and we wanted to try to get some momentum going into the [Atlantic 10 Tournament]."

The Minutemen turned their determination into two one-out singles by Derek Dana and Glenn DiSarcina, and Carelli got ahead in the count, 3-1, to Central Conn starter Chris Hooker.

"He threw me a fastball pretty much right down the middle," Carelli said. "It was a real good pitch to hit."

The pitch was lined to the left-field fence while the runners were in motion. Dana scored and DiSarcina dove into the plate safely to tie the score at four.

Rick Bottalico relieved Hooker, and walked pinch-hitters Andy Pelis and Dave Edwards to load the bases.

Mike Tobin stepped up against reliever Brian Lafaive and watched as catcher Massey tried to pick Edwards off at first, but he didn't even have a chance. First baseman Garrison dropped the ball and just stood there as Carelli sprinted home for the winning run.

UMass jumped out to a 1-0 lead in the first inning when center fielder Mike Tobin led off with a single, stole second, advanced to third on a wild pitch, and scored on an Ian Torres ground out to first.

Central Conn tied it in the fourth when Garrison singled with two outs, and scored when Russell walked the next three batters.

The score stood at 1-1 until the last of the seventh when Dana led off with a home run, his sixth of the year. This appeared to be all the offense that the Minutemen would need.

Extra Innings: UMass won their 1,000th game in beating Central Conn. Coach Mike Stone indicated he won't be around for another thousand, "especially if they're all like that one."

The Minutemen travel to Boyertown, Pa. today for the Atlantic-10 Tournament. Rich Graham will pitch the first game against A-10 West Division winner Penn State at 4:05 p.m. on Friday. UMass finished second to Rutgers in the East Division. The four-team, double-elimination tournament finishes on Sunday.

Penn State, winning 11-of-12 lately, and Rutgers, on a 10-game winning streak, are favored to win the A-10 Tourney. Penn State left-hander Chris Cisar, who was named A-10 Pitcher of the Week, will probably start against UMass on Friday.

Russell earned a spot on the playoff roster with his performance, Stone said.

"He pitched a great game," Stone said of Russell. "He hadn't pitched for about a

Track competes at New Englands

By KEITH BENNETT
Collegian Correspondent

Coach Ken O'Brien said he is hoping for a finish among the top 10 teams from the University of Massachusetts men's track and field team. The Minutemen will compete in the New England Championships at Williams College this weekend.

O'Brien said he expects the top five teams to include Northeastern, Boston University, Rhode Island, Dartmouth and Brown. The next group of five would include Connecticut, Southern Connecticut, Boston College and UMass. UMass finished 10th last year but was only six points away from sixth place.

"I expect a similar performance to last year," O'Brien said. "We would need an outstanding performance to finish near the top five. If we have an average day, we should finish around tenth."

The decathlon competition is being contested Wednesday and Thursday. All other events will take place on Friday and Saturday.

Brian Bednarek, Dave Borges and Paul Doyle will compete in the decathlon for UMass. Bednarek placed fifth in this 10-event competition at New Englands last year.

Sprinter Kevin Walters will compete in both the 100- and 200-meter races. He made it to the finals in the 100 at New Englands last year and has run times of 10.97 and 22.20 seconds, respectively.

Steve Brown and Mike Grey will run the 400. Grey has run 49.90 this season.

Brown placed third at New Englands last spring, setting the school record at 47.87. He placed third again in NEs at 49.23 during the winter but pulled a hamstring during the race and has not run the 400 this spring. His time from the winter still qualifies him for competition this spring.

Jon Corso is the only other Minuteman who placed at New Englands last year. He will try to improve on

Speculating on NCAA lax picks

By ADRIEN MATT
Collegian Staff

So it's Thursday and there's no lacrosse games on campus or in New England or on the Eastern Seaboard for that matter. So what can you do until the NCAA announces who's playing who next week?

Speculate — until you're blue in the face. And then you may still be wrong.

The United States Intercollegiate Lacrosse Association, the coaches and athletic directors who rate the schools during the regular season, has reshuffled the Top 20 since the University of Massachusetts lost to Syracuse last Saturday and this is how it breaks down:

1. North Carolina 12-0
2. Brown 13-0
3. Princeton 11-2
4. Johns Hopkins 8-3
5. Virginia 10-3
6. Syracuse 9-2
7. Maryland 8-4
8. Loyola 7-3
9. Massachusetts 9-3
10. Towson 8-3
11. Rutgers 7-5
12. Duke 7-5

It's best to stop at 12 because they are the only ones that count — at least for the purposes of the NCAA playoffs. The top four teams get a bye, a waiver from playing in the first round, while the bottom half jockey for position and pair up according to win-loss record, strength of schedule and geographic proximity as well as cost to each school.

As it stands, UMass could face either Loyola or Maryland on May 15, but the final match-ups will be announced Sunday at 4 p.m.

The fifth through eighth teams have the home-field advantage and the others, obviously, have to travel.

UMass comes away from the regular season 4-2 at home and 5-1 on the road, so it may be beneficial to the team

Chucklehead

By PAUL DeGEORGE
Collegian Staff

[illegible]inky and you know [illegible]e your butt, sez Chucklehead!

They are. And you will. And at Spring Concert there will doubtless be anything else nearly as groovy as this nasty hip-hop-funk-rap band to make you move.

Chucklehead, a Boston-based band, is a self-proclaimed "Hip-hop theater brought to you funky by eight slap happy men on a mission to make you groove."

To ensure that their mission is regularly accomplished, the band uses four horns, a real rhythm section and some wickedly creative sampling which produces an irresistably danceable funk assault.

Their music includes influences ranging from James Brown to De La Soul, from George Clinton and Parliament Funkadelic to Sly and Barry White but instead of just fusing together the traditional funk styles of the 60's and 70's with the post-modern radio crap that now saturates the airwaves, Chucklehead actually brings a new twist to the genre.

Whether it's the frantic soundbites of network news Gulf War coverage or a manic bassline, their sound is definitely aggressive while staying away from being "Chilli Pepper punk-funk." The most accurate description around is given by guitarist Eb-Tide who says, "It's kind of like evil circus music."

If that's true, then their live shows are like Barnum and Bailey meet the Exorcist. The eight maniacal Chuckleheads

The Feelies

By JODY GABIN
Collegian Staff

When you discover [illegible] unknown band, you don't want to tell too [illegible]ople. You only let [illegible] a few trusted friends grinning smugly as they acknowledge your ear for "hip" music. The band becomes your own personal possession; you feel violated if you hear their songs on the radio. It's an attitude thing — if you've unearthed them, you're as cool as the band.

You may not want to tell too many people about the Feelies.

In 1977, the Feelies made their debut at Manchester High School in their hometown of Haledon, New Jersey. Around the release of Crazy Rhythms in 1980, they were hailed as the best underground band in New York, proving how much you can do with mumbled lyrics, a few guitars and a healthy Velvet Underground fixation.

"One recovers from their shows with a head full of empty," one critic wrote, "like coming off too much speed, staring at the television long after the station has signed off."

But despite their intense cult following, the Feelies shied away from the attention and disappeared for almost six years, waiting until 1986 to follow up their first album with The Good Earth, co-produced by Feelies guitarists/vocalists Glen Mercer and Bill Million, and R.E.M.'s Peter Buck. As with most guitar-oriented "alternative" bands, they were accused of sounding like R.E.M., when it's actually the other way around. In 1989, the Feelies were signed to

Gene Loves Jezebel

By DANIELLE DOWLING

Gene Loves Jezebel has [illegible]dissed.

They've [illegible]issed by Geffen who dropped the group from their roster when they were unsuccessful in marketing Gene Loves Jezebel to both the college/indie rock audience and the over-hormonal teenage hard-rockin' audience.

They've even been dissed by the Dead Milkmen. As vocalist Rodney Anonymous crooned on Beelzebubba, "If there is a God in heaven, I hope they all burn in hell."

Hopefully they won't be dissed when they come to grace our lovely little pond with their presence.

You'd think that after 10 years and five albums, three of which are on Geffen, Gene Loves Jezebel would get a little more respect. The group came into existence because of the aspirations of two brothers, Jay and Michael Aston. They left their native home of Porthcawl in South Wales back in 1981 and headed for London where they worked at the Institute of Contemporary Art.

A year later, the group they had loosely formed had acquired quite a following and therefore was signed to Beggars Banquet. After the release of their first album, Promise, they completed their current line-up with the addition of Peter Rizzo on bass and Chris Bell on drums to the already established one of Jay on vocals and guitar, Michael sharing vocals and James Stevenson on lead guitar.

In 1986, they released Discover, their third album,

De La Soul

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

De La Soul is Dead. De La Soul is coming.

De La Soul is Dead is the name of the Amityville, N.Y. based hip hop trio's new album, due to be released later this month.

"De La Soul is coming" is a line that I lifted from Rolling Stone magazine, then kinda changed around to suit my needs.

Which is how it works, after all. De La Soul's 1989 debut 3 Feet High and Rising brought sampling — incorporating short bursts of other people's music into your own, original record — to the masses.

Everybody from Hall and Oates to the Turtles was fair game, and in the hands of Posdnuos, Trugoy and Baby Huey Maseo, a crossover smash record was the result; cuts from 3 Feet High and Rising, including the MTV staple "Me, Myself and I," permeated urban contemporary and college radio playlists alike.

The band promises that the new record is something altogether different. The Da.I.S.Y age days flowers and dayglow yellow peace symbols have been replaced by, well..."death."

De La Soul explains: "Striving for a style that sounds silly has matured a bit...With an uncontrollable overflow of flowers, oodles of O's, piles of demo tapes by da miles, and a misunderstanding of the Da.I.S.Y (age), we've decided to SHWING and relocate our onward steps onto the dead, De La that is."

Whatever that means, we'll find out Sunday afternoon.

Bob Dylan

By NICHOLAS OSTIS
Collegian Correspondent

Guitar sales soared into the stratosphere when Elvis burst into the public consciousness via television. I wonder how many people Bob Dylan inspired to write poetry when they heard that high-pitched voice creak out voluminous verse some years later.

It's been 30 years since Robert Zimmerman bailed out from Hibbing, Minnesota parroting his idol Woody Guthrie. Who could have know that he would become the Shakespeare of modern music? A pied piper who provoked an entire generation to question authority? Or live his life under a microscope, his every peep a source of scrutiny for the media?

Now an elder statesman himself, in spite of his ambivalence for the adulation, Dylan has defied convention through his highly publicized career. From his blasphemous act of going electric at the Newport Folk Festival in the mid-60's (for which he was reviled and booed) to becoming a born-again Christian in the late 70's (his Slow Train Coming with Dire Straits' Mark Knopfler won a Gospel Grammy) to embracing Judaism in the 80's, this restless minstrel's curiosity is seemingly boundless.

Through his music he has ralied against hypocrisy, lobbied for justice and bludgeoned the bullseye of truth with unparalled, searing eloquence. On the other hand, his sometimes cryptic poetry, with its subterranean, mystical or mythological characters, led his loyal legions of listeners make their shows as funky as their music. As trumpeter John Ray Schacter says, "What we do is make everyone the band; like a carnival."

"With the recession and the war," Eb-Tide says, "people aren't going to want to listen to angst-ridden music. They'll want to have fun." For that there is no band quite like Chucklehead.

A&M and released Only Life. Filmmaker Johnathan Demme, who became a Feelies fanatic after working with the band on Something Wild, included the track "Too Far Gone" on the soundtrack to Married to the Mob and directed the band's video for "Away."

Time for a Witness, released this year, was borne out of 15-minute jams in Mercer's basement.

"This record is kind of a return to our roots," says Mercer. "Bill and I are getting back to the way we used to play together."

To the Feelies, it's never seemed to matter whether they become a commercial success; they like things the way they are. But with the rave reviews Time for a Witness has been earning them, and their appearance at Sunday's Pond Concert, you may not have to tell anyone about them. The well-kept secret will be out.

which was their first LP on the Geffen label. It was followed by House of Dolls in 1987. But alas, they were dissed again. This time it was by Michael who amicably split with the group before the release of their current LP, Kiss of Life.

"When he left," brother Jay said of the split, "the band could have dissipated, but it had the opposite effect. We were hungry again." I guess not hungry enough for Geffen, but hungry enough for Atlantic who has just recently signed the group. But go see for yourselves on Sunday.

down a tangled path to figure out just what he was trying to say. He confides that his proliferation of ideas wells up from the great unconscious. That admission, however, hasn't stopped devoted Dylanologists from mining his songs for nourishment.

Certainly, he has earned the respect of his peers. Some who have recorded his songs are George Harrison, Jimi Hendrix, The Byrds, Peter, Paul and Mary, The Grateful Dead, Richie Havens, Leon Russell and Joe Cocker.

Although many of his staunch supporters have expressed discontent with his work in the last decade, his recent collaborations with The Travelling Wilburys and tours with Petty and the Heartbreakers and the Grateful Dead have introduced him to a wider cross section of people.

It's not surprising to see three generations attending his concerts. These tours also find him rearranging ancient material with fiery invigoration.

At this year's Grammy Awards ceremony, no less a rebel than Jack Nicholson, obviously beaming with pride, narrated an emotional tribute to Dylan before presenting him to a huge international television audience.

Monumental and revered is his body of work that Columbia Records recently released, The Bootleg Series, Volumes 1-3 (Rare and Unreleased, 1961-1991), a 58-song compilation of Dylan demos, rehearsals, outtakes, alternates and concert recordings.

Like a rolling stone, chipped and rough around the edges, Deputy Dylan lays down the law and rocks the pond on Sunday.

Scream at Pearl Street

There's more to the Northwest than Twin Peaks and Sasquatch.

There's an actual music scene out there complete with record labels like Sub-Pop and Nasty Mix. Out of the rugged and hearty environment comes a nasty kind of sound provided by groups like Soundgarden, Alice in Chains, Nirvana and Mudhoney.

Screaming Trees

But Screaming Trees have nothing to do with that scene.

They come from Ellensburg, Washington where they formed the group back in the mid-80s. It consists of brothers Gary Lee Conner and Van Conner on guitar and bass respectively and Mark Lanegan on vocals. They lost their drummer Mark Pickerel in September 1990. For now, Rod Doak has taken over the duties.

They've released a numerous amount of psychadelic-tinged EP's and LP's. Their current album, Uncle Anesthesia, is their first release on a major label, Epic.

Tired of the mundane?

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

You're uptown on a Saturday night nursing your fifth Long Island Iced Tea when you notice a band setting up their gear. "Oh, great," you muse facetiously. "More covers of Poison and Slaughter. Where oh where is there a band that plays something besides Top 40 covers and mindless tripe?"

If this scenario describes you at Twisters this Saturday, perhaps you should reconsider how much Long Island Iced Tea you can really hold. Because Detour doesn't cover Top 40. And they'll be the first to tell you that they're not a "band."

"It's more of a 'Rock Music Project,' explained keyboardist and vocalist Paul Carter. "We have a definite idea of what we want to sound like and what we want to play."

What do they like to play — an eclectic mix of covers of Steely Dan, The Police and Little Feat, to name a few — is what brought the four-man group together roughly a year ago.

"We got together because we wanted to play Steely Dan and Little Feat," noted Carter, a UMass graduate student in music theory. Bassist Bob Lawless (psychology) and guitarist/vocalist Mike Bisdee (jazz composition) are also grad students, while drummer Dan Wallace is an undergraduate performance major.

The band's sound reflects their variety of influences as well. Frontmen Bisdee and Carter strike a balance between keyboards and blues guitar. Both have an honest singing voice. Wallace's drum technique is impressive and shows his training in jazz. Holding it all together is Lawliss, who has played both rock and jazz bass and admits that he likes to "get into a groove."

Detour's members all agreed that an apt discription of them is "eclectic," and their set list bears that out. It includes such diverse titles as Steely Dan's 'Kid Charlemagne,'' "Hate to Lose Your Lovin'" from Little Feat, "Life During Wartime" by the Talking Heads and Joe Cocker's "Feelin' Alright."

Detour plays Twisters Saturday night at 9 p.m.

The hell, purgatory and heaven of Growing Up Queer

By AMY HENRY
Collegian Staff

The "Inferno," "Purgatorio" and "Paradiso" are the settings of Dante's Divine Comedy. They are also the scenes of Growing up Queer in America, hell is New Jersey, purgatory is Florida and heaven is the North Shore of Lake Superior.

The one-woman comedic play was written and performed by Chris Cinque who has been active in theatre as a writer and performer for 14 years and is currently a member of the Playwrights' Center.

"Growing up Queer in America is a series of stories that capture an aspect of American life rarely seen," Cinque said. "You don't have to be a lesbian to enjoy they play. People of all orientations have come up to me after the show and said they can relate to it. There are some experiences that are universal."

Queer combines the theatrical storytelling style popularized by Lily Tomlin and a melding of fantasy, autobiography, allegory, classic and common language and theatrical performance.

The play is based on Cinque's own life experiences. She said she is almost at "heaven," a stage in her play. "I feel like I have resolved a lot of early life issues," she said.

Cinque said she got the idea for Queer from the book Love Medicine by Louise Erdich, who wrote about the disenfranchisement of native Americans on the Dakota reservation.

"I thought if she could do it, I could write about my people," Cinque said.

The play opened the 1990 Women's Theatre Festival in Boston. It also ran in D.C., during the national march on Washington for Lesbian and Gay Rights and has had extended runs in Los Angeles, Seattle, and Minneapolis.

Cinque has written and performed numerous other plays including: White House Wives, Tocklas MN: the Lesbisan Soap Opera, Low life on a High Plane, In Search of Merrill Strange, The Clearing House, The House that Dorothy Built, Queen Sheets, and The Dracula Tapes.

Queer marks the end of a year of gay, lesbian and bisexual events put on by the UMass Program for Gay, Lesbian an Bisexual Concerns.

Felice Yeskel, the director of the program said, "It has been a wonderful year and by having these events we have helped build a multicultural campus."

She added, "I hope in the future that other organizations on campus who bring speakers, plays etc. would be more inclusive of gay, lesbian and bisexual issues and we wouldn't have to plan this year long event to bring awareness."

Tickets can be bought in Noho at Party Party, in Amherst at Food For Thought, and at UMass at the Program for Gay Lesbian and Bisexual Concerns.

Tickets will be $3 for UMass students with id and $6 for the general public. The play will be performed Saturday, May 11th at 8 p.m. and Sunday, May 12th at 3 p.m. in the Hampden Theatre.

Poll says voters support sales tax increase

By MARC ELLIOTT
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — About 68 percent of Massachusetts voters support raising the sales tax one percent to fund public education, according to a poll released yesterday by "A Penny for the Future" coalition.

The Boston political consulting firm of Marttila & Kiley polled 607 Massachusetts voters and 68 percent favored raising the sales tax from five to six cents. Seventy-three percent favored raising the sales tax if the extra revenue went to public education. The funds generated by the tax increase would benefit public education from kindergarten to the university level.

The poll results were unveiled during a press conference held in the Boston Park Plaza Hotel and attended by about 70 state education leaders, dignitaries, and press, as well as eight state legislators.

"The purpose of this poll is to point out to [Gov. Weld] that there is a lot of public support for taxes if they go out to public education," said Massachusetts Teachers Association spokesperson Steve Wollmer.

Wollmer said he believes Gov. Weld has been "misreading" public opinion on new taxes to fund public education.

"The public is very clear in its support; over a 68 to 34 percent margin for the increased tax," he said. "The governor has been misreading or misevaluating public opinion on public higher education."

Respondents to the survey still supported the increased sales tax even after being given evidence suggesting that it might not be a good idea, State Representative Stan Rosenberg (D-Amherst) said.

"Sixty-eight percent, even after you try to talk them out of it by telling them what could be wrong with it, they still support raising the sales tax," Rosenberg said.

Rosenberg filed a bill last month to raise funds for public education by either raising the sales tax by a penny or raising income tax by two tenths of one percent. The income tax is slated to decrease by three tenths this January after the bonds for last year's deficit are paid off.

Raising the sales tax by one percent would raise an estimated $350 to $400 million for public education while raising the income tax by two tenths of one percent would raise closer to $400 million, according to Rosenberg's office staff.

Rosenberg said he would prefer that the income tax rather than the sales tax be raised, but he said the money must be raised regardless of which venue is chosen.

"We've go to do what has got to be done and what has got to be done is to save public education, or the entire state's economy will suffer," Rosenberg said.

Hearings for the bill were held two weeks ago and the bill was sent to the House of Representatives Taxation Committee where it now waits for approval to be sent to the House Ways and Means Committee.

The "Penny for the Future" coalition is an alliance of pro-education groups such as the Massachusetts Teachers Association, the Massachusetts Parent Teacher Student Association, business representatives, state education leaders, school superintendents, and state student leaders.

Lawyer: furloughs unconstitutional

BOSTON (AP) — A legislative budget-cutting measure requiring state workers to take unpaid furloughs or deferred compensation is a form of unconstitutional tax on public employees, a public defender argued yesterday.

Marjory German asked the Supreme Judicial Court to strike down the furlough program which is estimated to save the state around $70 million for the fiscal year which ends June 30.

But Assistant General William Porter urged the court to reject her arguments, saying the furloughs were a cost-cutting measure, not a tax.

German argued her case on behalf of herself and other non-union state employees.

State employees unions also have sued to block the furlough program, but none of their cases have reached the high court yet.

The unions also argue that the furloughs are unconstitutional because they interfere with contracts they have with the state.

German said she and other non-union employees don't have that argument available to them since most work without a written contract.

Virtually all state employees earning more than $20,000 a year, including those working for independent authorities and many working indirectly for the state in human services provider agencies, were required by the law to take the furlough.

German argued that the furloughs were a discriminatory tax applied by Gov. William F. Weld and the Legislature only to state employees and not to other wage-earners in the state.

"This is a tax. A state employee must surrender money to the general fund," German argued.

"It's called a furlough. The practical matter is to take money from me to help the state with its budget," she said.

German said the furlough is costing her personally $1,232, an amount equal to eight days pay. Her annual salary is $40,040, she said.

Porter said the furlough was a reasonable alternative to more drastic cost-saving measures such as a government shut down or massive state employee layoffs, that would have had to occur without it.

"It is simply a temporary pay reduction for state employees," Porter said. "The furlough program is not a tax. It is a spending reduction measure."

For most workers, Porter said, the furlough program granted three options; taking unpaid time off now, working and collecting vacation time in the next two fiscal years, or working and collecting their lost pay when they leave state government. Some essential state employees, such as prison guards, were denied the unpaid time off option.

Chief Justice Paul Liacos said a government shutdown would raise even more difficult questions of employee rights, a view Porter shared. The government's staff has been planning a possible shutdown for the last week of June if other steps to solve the state budget deficit are inadequate.

Porter said the Legislature was acting legitimately in approving the furlough plan because of the state's fiscal emergency, a deficit of at least $850 million this fiscal year, and its right to set employees salaries.

"The statute does not raise revenue. What it does is reduce spending from revenues already raised," Porter said.

Students reject administrative government

Ballot box stuffing proves ineffectual; phony votes found

By ALEX DERING
Collegian Staff

The embryonic governmental structure proposed by the Commission on Undergraduate Student Governance was defeated last night in a 511 to 282 referendum vote.

The referendum turnout, which Jo-Anne Vanin, vice chancellor of student affairs said would show how students felt toward the efforts of the commission, indicated that a majority of students are not in support of continued work by the commission.

The commission was established when several Student Government Association leaders asked the administration to take over the student government, which they felt had become unmanageable.

The administration announced its decision to assist in the restructuring of student government and formed a commission of students and administrators to develop a new government.

Before the tallying began the ballot counters learned at least one ballot box had been stuffed by the "Student Liberation Front," in an attempt to invalidate the referendum (see page 5).

The "bogus" ballots were easily located.

"There was an excess of 85 votes in the Southwest-South ballot box," said Angus McQuilken, who oversaw the tallying of the ballots. "Upon looking at the ballots themselves, it was obvious that these were the bogus votes."

The bogus voting slips had been reproduced on a poorer quality machine than the "official" voting slips. In addition, the bogus votes were of different dimensions than the official slips and had been unevenly cut.

The bogus votes were removed and a check of the Southwest-South Alpha list, which indicated the number McQuilken called the attempted stuffing of the ballot box "disgusting," and added that the 85 votes did not affect the results of the referendum.

The final results were 511 "no" votes, 282 "yes" votes, 36 unconfirmed absentee ballots and eight abstentions. The unconfirmed absentee ballots will be verified within a few days and added to the final results.

UM alum discusses his writing

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

When Paul Theroux was a Peace Corps volunteer in Africa in the early 1960s he daydreamed about driving his father's car through his hometown of Medford, Massachusetts, and the fantasies were included in the short stories and essays he wrote.

When Theroux moved to London, his memories of Africa inspired The Mosquito Coast, a best-selling novel that later became a movie.

Theroux is a writer, he told a Memorial Hall audience of more than 150 last night, because he has "a reasonably good memory. Not a particularly accurate one, but a full one."

Theroux, a member of the University of Massachusetts Class of '63 and the author of 30 books, including Riding the Iron Rooster, The Great Patagonia Express, and The Mosquito Coast, spoke of "memory and creation" as the fifth annual Frederick S. Troy guest lecturer last night.

Every person has the capacity to remember enormous amounts of information, Theroux said. Souvenirs, smells, friends, music and other things can all trigger memory.

Theroux, who has published accounts of train trips across four of the world's seven continents, said his favorite source of inspiration is travel.

Growing up in the "reactionary" late 1950s caused a sense of desperation, Theroux said, leading to his "haphazard and accidental" decision to join the Peace Corps and go to Africa. Though some people travel to forget, for Theroux the experience was a "stimulus" that helped him unlock the store of memories that later became the raw material from which his fiction is created.

Going to Africa "taught me that nothing in your mind is lost. It may forget temporarily, but it's there. You have to think of a way of getting it out.

"The best thing for [writers] to do is go leave their family, leave their house. Go as far away as possible. It's only in that way will you remember your house, your parents, your town . . .

Travelers seem to be escaping, but the real travelers are not afraid of the past."

In Africa Theroux "used to mentally get in my father's car and drive around Medford . . . basically I made a tour of the Medford that I knew in my mind. This way I had a way for remembering, and I could write about it.

"I remember the details of my stories. I do not invent them."

Theroux reminisced about getting arrested at UMass for taking part in one of the first anti-Vietnam protests on campus, and also admitted to a broad taste for books and literature.

Kitty Kelly's biography of Nancy Reagan is "crap," Theroux said, "but I suppose there's a grain of truth in it.

"The most revealing writing isn't great writing. Writers reveal themselves through all writing. It's not a worthless pursuit to pick up a National Enquirer or Stephen King. There's a subtext to it all. I think you have to read all the literature of the age to get a sense of the flavor of the time."

Free sperm alternative to spermbank

By DANIEL J. LYONS
Collegian Staff

Donating sperm to lesbian couples, single lesbians, and single heterosexual women who want children as an alternative to expensive sperm banks was the topic of a Wednesday evening forum sponsored by the Men's Resource Connection at the Bangs Community Center in Amherst.

Speakers at the discussion included donors, both past and present, and recipients who shared their experiences. In order to protect individuals' privacy, speakers' names were withheld.

Early on, the group discussed different methods of sperm donation. According to the speakers, the most controversial method of sperm donation involves a "known donor.' Usually, in this scenario the man is known to the couple and the child from the beginning. This method, according to speakers, brings up questions about the role of the sperm donor in the development of the child.

One of the woman speakers who has used this method said, "I wanted a known donor . . .I'm single, I'm a lesbian, any child of mine would have a couple of wrinkles [to deal with] and I didn't want to complicate that any further."

A man who has been a known donor said he felt comfortable with the process. "I had this investment in seeing my genetic material go out there. My way of taking responsibility for my sperm was becoming a known donor."

A speaker explained there are two ways to go about becoming an unknown donor: The first is to work through a go-between. In this method, when the recipient is ready for fertilization, the middle-person contacts the donor who prepares the semen, then the middle-person transports it to the recipient without the two ever meeting.

He said another way to become an unknown donor is via a sperm bank. This is an extremely expensive option, which limits its usability to those who can afford it, he said. Some sperm banks, according to the speaker, release the name of the donor to the recipient when the child reaches the age of 18.

"My first thought from the whole thing was, 'Wow, what a great opportunity to open this up to these people,'" said one man who is considering becoming a donor but is having second thoughts. "I love the idea [of donating]. I think it is a great idea. I just don't want to open up a can of worms that I can't handle . . . I really still feel confused about it."

One lesbian woman who has been trying to conceive said, "It was a very hard situation . . . every month when you get your period and you are not pregnant, it is very devastating." She continued to describe her experience, "It is a lot harder than you think . . . you really have to think about all of the issues and how they will impact on you . . . One of the most important things is to trust."

A group spokesperson said anyone interested in receiving more information or becoming a donor can contact the Men's Resource Connection at 201 North Valley Road, Pelham, MA 01002 or by phone at 253-7693.

LBG community argues uses of the label 'queer'

By CHRIS MUTHER
Collegian Staff

More than 50 people gathered in the Campus Center at the University of Massachusetts last night to discuss the label of "queer" and their degree of comfort with the word at an open forum.

Members of the gay community and their allies expressed mixed feelings about reclaiming the word queer as their own. The label has been increasing in popularity within the lesbian, bisexual and gay community.

"I react to the word queer the same way I react to the word nigger," said Amherst resident Tim Blake. "We didn't choose these names [fag, dyke, queer]; they were placed on us. We chose gay, bisexual and lesbian."

Queer Nation UMass spokesperson Sean Sullivan said he feels the word is a good blanket term for the gay community because it does not single out any group.

"The word queer brings up issues I don't want to forget," he said. "I also think it's a good word because we're all different and everybody can identify with queer."

Felice Yeskel, director of the Program for Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Concerns, said although she finds the label queer "fun and campy," she said personally the label gives her a feeling of exclusion.

"I think the word queer has male associations," Yeskel said. "I don't feel included by it. The pink triangle was a symbol of gay men and has become a symbol for all of us. It's like using mankind instead of humankind."

Another topic which drew mixed feelings from the crowd was bisexuality. Although the majority of the group felt bisexuals are an integral part of the gay community, some women felt differently.

"It has something to do with trust," said one woman who did not wish to be identified. "I have more trust in a person if they identify as gay or lesbian. Who knows when a bisexual will switch?"

Many at the open forum said they thought homosexuals should be treated the same as everyone, but also as unique individuals.

Sen. Kennedy's nephew charged with rape

By DANA KENNEDY
The Associated Press

WEST PALM BEACH, FLA. — William Kennedy Smith was charged with rape yesterday, nearly six weeks after a 29-year-old woman reported he attacked her at the Kennedy family's seaside estate.

State Attorney David Bludworth said a warrant had been issued for Smith's arrest, and police said the 30-year-old Georgetown University medical student was expected to surrender early next week.

"I'm very confident that when this thing is resolved that I'll be able to stand by my original statement, which was that I didn't commit an offense of any kind," Smith said in Washington.

In a statement, the woman, stepdaughter of a retired Midwestern industrialist, said: "I feel a profound sense of relief and vindication."

If convicted, a defendant with no prior criminal record could face a sentence from probation to four and one half years under sentencing guidelines.

Bludworth's announcement before more than 100 reporters capped weeks of speculation and controversy in the United States and overseas. The intense interest has been driven in part by the fact that Smith was in the presence of his uncle, Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), and the senator's son, Rhode Island state Rep. Patrick Kennedy, the night of the incident.

Extensive news coverage of the event has itself been a topic of debate, in part over the decision of some news organizations to name the woman who made the accusation.

Providing more fuel for that debate, Bludworth announced that he had filed misdemeanor charges against the publishers of The Globe newspaper. The Boca Raton-based supermarket tabloid was the first American paper to print the name of the woman. Bludworth charged the tabloid with violating a 1911 Florida statute that bars identifying rape victims.

In a statement read by her attorney, the woman thanked her family, friends and lawyers for supporting her and "other victims of rape whose courage has been of immense value."

"Rape needs to be reported to keep others from going through this ordeal," attorney David Roth quoted her as saying. But she added that "had I known my name would have been released, it might have dissuaded me from going through with this."

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

Journalism majors have more options than news writing

For as long as I can remember, I have wanted to be a writer, a journalist. I was going to write the "Great American Novel," or if not that, at least be a newspaper reporter. When I was younger, I kept journals, wrote stories, excelled at writing in junior high and high school and became a feature editor of the high school paper. I was every teacher's dream, because I wrote clearly and concisely. Sensibly, when I applied to college, there was no question in my mind that I would pursue my dream and study journalism.

But somewhere along my road of higher education, that dream was shattered. The Collegian helped to change my mind. I didn't enjoy the tension involved in putting a news story together. The stress was not suitable to my Type-B personality. I realized, as a college freshman, that my lifelong ambition, my goal to be a great journalist would not happen.

After experiencing my first writing class my junior year, my belief became clearer. Putting a story together elevated my blood pressure, I was miserable and many times unable to make the deadlines imposed. I dreaded the two-hour class and found my love of writing had turned to hate. The old saying "You never know until you try" was coming true for me. However, despite it all, I kept the journalism major. I didn't want to stay in school longer than four years. Besides I had no idea what else I would study. Instead, when I was unable to get journalism classes, I took classes in other areas of interest.

Now, as a college senior, about to graduate this May, I look back on those all-annoying questions from the outside world:
Relatives: "So honey, do you want to write for a paper?"
Friends: "Have you applied to many papers?" Professors: "Write for the Collegian and gain experience."
They all point to the same assumption — If you are studying journalism, then you want to write for a career.

Jennifer Tarlin

My answer to these questions is NO. I don't want to write anymore. Writing has lost the thrill it once brought me. I see it as an unpleasant chore, like doing laundry.

So, what is a lone journalism major who doesn't want to write for a career to do? There are many options available.

My wise parents have taught me something important: It is a known fact that what you pursue in college is not necessarily what you pursue in life. Makes sense, but is sometimes difficult for a stressed-out 22-year old, deciding what to do with her life, to grasp.

My mother studied to be an elementary school teacher and is now a high school guidance counselor. My father studied biology and is now working successfully in sales. Also, those who are sure what their career will be, often find themselves dissatisfied with their work. Knowing your exact pursuits at age 21 or 22 is not realistic. Another important point for the journalism major is that writing and communication skills are needed for many positions. You are at an advantage if you polish these skills over the years.

Remember, also, that education never ends. Learning can continue on your own. You could pursue something else in graduate school, take different courses or land a job which turns out to be in an unexpected area of interest. Lastly, remember you're not alone. When sharing this topic with my classmates, I thought I would hear great laughter. Instead, I heard words of encouragement to write this piece.

Keeping these points in mind, if you are looking for a job now, don't be afraid to apply in other areas. My personal aspirations now include applying to a graduate management program. Soon after graduation, I will start preparing with courses that are a journalism major's biggest nightmare — MATH — statistics and computers. These will help me prepare and also make me more valuable to an employer. The more skills you have to offer, the better.

As I look back on the past four years, I have no regrets about choosing journalism as my major. Somehow, I couldn't have seen myself studying physics! As graduation quickly approaches, I proudly say to all that I am a journalism major who does not wish to write for a career. Instead, I will soon find another dream to pursue.

Jennifer Tarlin is a journalism major

Student invalidates vote

Look, we all know that student government has been a joke for the past 10 years. When the most recent crop of 'student leaders' took office, they had a mess to deal with. And, they failed. They weren't able to make student government work.

Most of the time, when leaders fail, they resign. In this case, however, they decided to hand over student government to the administration. The administration, in turn, was all too willing to pat these students on the head.

Jeremy Levinson

Now, if you recall, the administration has over the years done whatever it could to ignore students. From powerless committees to civil rights violations in the dorms. If you recall the most recent example, the administration was ready to violate state law in order to create their own student government. The threat of a lawsuit quickly changed their minds.

What do we learn? Firstly, the administration looks out for itself. Secondly, they will do to students whatever they feel. Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Vanin went as far as to write a letter to the community announcing who the real 'student leaders' were. It says something that their mandate came from Whitmore and not from students.

Anyway, Dennis Madson, before leaving for another job, created a commission to restructure student government. There were those of us who knew what the result would be — a student government designed to sit like a lap-dog next to the administration. Vice Chancellor Vanin soon confirmed our fears: She informed the committee what they could and could not do. For example, the Student Activities Office, which receives over 25 percent of SATF ($500,000!), was one of those things that could not be altered.

So, this commission, which had to meet in virtual secrecy, decided with no real student input what student government should look like. Then they scheduled yesterday's election. I'm surprised that Chancellor Vanin didn't send us letters telling us which way to vote.

Some of us still believe that institutions which train people to live in a democratic society should be democratic — a concept apparently foreign to Whitmore. What option do students have if those in power will do as they please? We aren't allowed to vote in our own elections without a court order, we can't spend our own money and we can't choose our own representation. What path do we have to express ourselves?

Well, let me tell you. Given no other choice, I gave my ID to the ballot workers and received my ballot. I then spun on my heels and made for the nearest photocopy. A bunch of us then made over 400 copies of the ballot and proceeded to stuff ballot boxes. If the administration can make its own rules, then so can we.

Don't think for a minute we don't realize that student government has been a joke. But some of us have faith that students can do for students. We do not need to be manipulated by Whitmore. Left alone to do some hard work, students will straighten out their own problems. Last week's lawsuit-induced change of heart by the administration shows that they aren't as concerned about us as they are about themselves.

Undergrads do need representation. We haven't had any for awhile. But, nothing will get better until the administration learns to deal with students honestly and democratically. Until then we will continue to destroy these sham elections.

Democracy. Is that too much to ask?

A son's thought for mother's day

Why is it that we grow up resenting our parents? We discard their advice: "You should wear a jacket out there." Yeah, right, Mom. Don't be uptight. We reject their interest: "Where are you going tonight?" Out. Just out. Don't invade my privacy. We resent their concern: "I'm worried about your grades. What's the trouble?" I don't know, I'll figure it out. Don't hassle me. We avoid their companionship: "Would you like to see a movie with me, son?" I'm going out with friends. Don't ruin my fun. We misread and rebuff almost every attempt they make to take an interest and lend a hand in our lives. Don't get in my way. I've got my own life to live.

For most of us there comes a time when we realize our mistake. Perhaps we see it when we go out on our own. Or have our own children. Or, tragically, when a parent dies. We realize the obvious; our parents loved us. They created us and helped us — helped a part of themselves — grow apart and away. They organized their lives around our needs and our wants and, often, our whims. They offered guidance as we blundered through the world in juvenile ignorance.

Why did we doubt their intentions? When they confront us about the wisdom of our actions, how could we say — after 18 years of living in their home, surviving off their effort, learning their knowledge, and running to them to remedy our mistakes — You don't really care about me.

Some of us are fortunate enough to see — or be shown — our colssal mistake while our parents are still alive and before we've alienated them for good. If we find the courage, we can have the deeply rewarding experience of watching our parents react when we say to them: I didn't understand then, but I see now that you always meant the best for me. Thank you. I'm sorry I doubted.

Try it. Whether or not they realize it, your parents have been living for that moment since you were born. You won't regret the doors you open.

Whose newspaper is it anyway?

All too often on this campus community, we are presented with views that are radical. Not that this is bad, but it alienates and stifles the voices of the moderate majority. There seems to be little room for the middle ground, and politically moderate views and ideas. For example, often in the Collegian there will be editorials that are written by LBGA or Republican Club members. Both sides are usually bashing each other in order to convey their political views. The Collegian is the biggest news source on campus. It is responsible for most of the information that students intake. Unfortunately, the Collegian has never lived up to its responsibility as a campus newspaper.

Why do so many people dislike the Collegian? Could it be the racist Third World Affairs Editor Pratip Dastidar who constantly bashes Israel, and his cohort Hussein Ibish, who supports any anti-Israel effort? Could it be the vast amount of anti-United States rhetoric sung by many multicultural affairs columnists? Why do they constantly complain about how much the United States sucks, when many of us take pride in our great union? Could it be the blatantly anti-White male slant of columnists Meredith O'Brien and Pamela McCarthy? Perhaps they need to lighten up a bit. Could it be the extreme leftist slant of former Editorial Editor Jeremy Levinson, who constantly is cynical about our University, country, and lifestyle?

As an open-minded White male on this campus, too often I get aggravated by the Collegian's attempt to inject liberalism (which often ends up as close-minded as extreme conservatism) into the campus community. It is clear that if the Collegian truly represented the campus community fairly, then we would have a delicate balance of views from all sides of this campus. I urge those frustrated with the Collegian to write in and let your opinions be known. And to all those graduating, remember: UMass is not like the rest of the world, so don't get discouraged.

Don't editorialize the TWA page

I would like to take issue with some strong comments in an article that appeared on the Third World Affairs page on May 1 ("delightful tie-dye wearing . . . anti-war, tree hugging, grass eating . . . and utterly ineffectual . . ."). With one stroke of his pen, the author of this article has trivialized many social movements and groups in the United States and elsewhere. As someone who has lived in Third World countries, and came to the United States a year ago, I wondered how the author formed such opinions; opinions that are surprisingly similar to those of the mainstream 'establishment' in this country.

In the established national media, the pacifist movement of the '60s and '70s was depicted as nothing but the disgruntled cry of "disoriented jobless hippies" and the author perpetuates this notion and paints a similar image of the war protesters of this decade. I have observed the movement in this valley and saw nothing but a group of active citizens, with humanitarian values and concerns, expressing their minority voices through all channels available to them in a democracy. To find nothing but "amusement and color" in this movement is very offensive to its sincere participants.

Nothing could concern the Third World more than the blatant squandering of the natural resources of the entire world by industrialized nations. Many of our hopes rest on the growing ecological awareness in the United States and Europe and, if anything, we should lend our moral support to the environmental movement in these countries. Organizations like the Sierra Club, Audobon Society, and Greenpeace have all opposed the war against Iraq (and similar interference in the Third World). I wonder what the author has against such "tree hugging" groups, whose aims do not conflict with Third World interests.

The author's dig at vegetarians is a very personal opinion and does not deserve any attention. The only thing it has in common with the other targets of his scorn is that it is also a growing minority that is subject to the ridicule of the "mainstream establishment." This article is very opinionated and does not reflect the popular opinions of most Third World peoples (and, as the author points out, definitely does not represent the Third World community on this campus).

A more appropriate disclaimer for such articles would be "This article is the opinion of the writer and does not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian Staff OR the views of the Third World Community." I decided to raise this issue with the editor of the Third World Affairs page, and was surprised to find that the author, Pratip Dastidar, IS the Third World Affairs Editor! I strongly feel that such individual opinions should go on the Ed/Op page and that no one should be allowed to editorialize in other sections of the Collegian.

Jazz columnist bids a final adieu to readers

By BILL ROSENBLATT
Collegian Staff

Now it's time to say goodbye. . .For the past two and a half years, I have been occupying this space, promoting, advocating, expounding, criticizing and theorizing about the music called jazz. I've learned a lot from researching these columns, and I hope you have too.

I have been constantly encouraged by the growth of jazz activity and popularity here in the Valley. WMUA's morning jazz programming, which started three years ago, continues to grow in listenership. It's a real thrill to hear it played in more and more area stores. The Magic Triangle concert series was inaugurated last year as the brainchild of WMUA's Glenn Siegel; most of its shows sold out, and there is every prospect of its continuing next year.

Early this year, Iron Horse owner Jordi Herold was worried about low ticket sales after having booked several top-drawer jazz acts for dates within a short space of time — during a recession. His worries proved unfounded. In February, the newly-reformed Duke Ellington Committee of UPC booked Branford Marsalis into the Fine Arts Center and expected maybe half the seats to sell. But the 2000-seat house was almost full. Much of the audience had never been to a jazz concert before and were attracted by Branford's "name;" they gave him a standing ovation.

In other words, the people of this area have proven (once again) that jazz can attract a large, appreciative audience if it gets the presentation and promotion it deserves. The music is vital and need not go the way of European classical music into academic/historic ossification. I like to think that my efforts in these pages, on the radio and elsewhere have helped in this regard.

I have certainly learned a lot during my five years here — a lot about music, and other things they didn't seem to teach at the "prestige" high school and college I attended. The overall impression of jazz I have acquired is that the music has suffered scandalous neglect by this country's music/business establishment. We have lavishly-appointed concert halls in every major city, some of the world's finest orchestras, numerous conservatories, festivals, young-musician competitions, public radio stations — all in the service of a musical tradition that, however great, is not our own.

Valley Jazz

Jazz, however, is America's ultimate musical art form, and it is just as artistically significant as any other society's representative music. This fact has been repeated over and over, but people don't seem to understand its implications. If the establishment took this statement to heart, our cities would have jazz orchestras; there would be jazz schools, jazz competitions, annual multi-million-dollar corporate jazz subsidies, all-jazz public radio stations, etc., etc. Furthermore, the music probably wouldn't even be qualified with the label "jazz."

Why isn't this the case? OK, one reason is the relative youth of the music; bear in mind that the first American symphony orchestras weren't established until more than a century after American independence. However, the main reason (c'mon, you should know this by now) is that the establishment's arbiters of taste still adhere to Eurocentric artistic criteria. So-called jazz is American music (though invented almost exclusively by African-Americans); the criteria should be "Americentric," which should necessarily include "Afrocentric."

However, the current situation can change. Indeed, there are already substantial signs of progress: Max Roach's MacArthur Prize last year, the new Thelonious Monk Institute in North Carolina, a recent $4.3 million blanket NEA grant for jazz, African-American music programs at universities (like this one), last year's institutionalization of jazz at Lincoln Center, and a few other developments.

We can help things change faster by letting the powers that be know that we support the music. Unfortunately, this — like most things in this country — involves money. See as many concerts as you can! Buy albums! Support jazz-playing college and public radio stations at fundraising time! And get your friends to do the same. Above all, don't take the music for granted, because everyone else seems to.

Before I finish, I'd like to acknowledge in print some of the many people who have contributed directly to my musical and cultural education here at UMass. In alphabetical order: Nedil Aldarondo, Ronnie "Ruff" Furr, Tomas Garcia, Sam Gilford, Hussein Ibish, Arthur Jemison, Rudy Krigger, Thomas Mambande, James Molesworth, Madan Rao, Max Roach, Aixa Rodriguez, Archie Shepp, Charles Sheffield, Glenn Siegel, Phil Straub, Dr. Fred Tillis, and many others. Thanks for opening my eyes, ears and mind.

I'd also like to thank five semesters' worth of Collegian Arts Editors who saw fit to give me this opportunity, and most of all, thank you for your attention. Later!

Off the Beaten Psycho is a refreshing aural treat

By DANIELLE DOWLING

Off the Beaten Psycopath
Tony Westcott

Travel Off the Beaten Psychopath and there you will find something different, something bizarre, something that has the power to dazzle and awe.

There's one thing that's certain about Tony Westcott's demo release — it is much better than the "alternative" crap major label record companies will shove down your throat with the help of MTV's Dave Kendall.

Sometimes it's so disturbing that the best music out there is found either on small, little mom-and-pop record labels or demos. A lot of the refuse that major labels see fit to release is bland and generic. Off the Beaten Psycopath has personality. It explores unknown territories and experiments without fear. After being inundated with music that is absolutely stagnant, listening to this demo is a refreshing experience.

"Your Mouth" is a nice, mellow ditty that gives you the feeling that you're spending a relaxing evening in Beezelbub's Love and Lizard Lounge. The structure is reminiscent of early Floyd tunes that one could find on Piper at the Gates of Dawn or Saucerfull of Secrets. The early Floyd influence is repeated on "Sweet Sister of My Heart," which has a dreamy, folkish essence as can also be found on "Winona Westcott."

The centerpiece of this album is its campy humor. An album that gives its listener a cheesy, comical ode to the late Ted Bundy demands attention, albeit psychiatric. The song, entitled "Dead Bundy," is complete with a chorus that croons "Ted, Ted Bundy, now he's dead," and lyrics that claim, "We may have killed his body, but we haven't killed his spirit." "Sex with My TV," a funky, kind of Deadish tune, is also ripe with humor and contains references to Punky Brewster reruns.

Westcott, a UMass student, produced, mixed, sang, wrote arranged and played almost all the instruments for the material on this album. To procure yourself a copy of this demo contact Westcott at 99 Tioga Street, Springfield, MA 01128 or call 546-6823. You won't be sorry.

Marlon Jordan Quintet

Wednesday, May 8

Just the other day I interviewed Archie Shepp, and one of the main points he stressed was that today's music industry was emphasizing youth. Record producers find it easier to market and sell a young face and name, more so than an older one. For the Marlon Jordan Quintet, youth is an understatement. Jordan himself is only twenty years old, with the rest of his group in the same range. Jordan, while hailing from New Orleans, is currently playing along the east coast, with a stop in Northampton the other night.

After hearing his debut album, I expected to see just another young kid in a snappy Italian suit doing his best Miles Davis/Wyton Marsalis imitation. What I saw, though, was better than expected. Jordan's sound is certainly in the Davis/Marsalis mold, yet there is a definite feeling and emotion in his play. He isn't just going through the motions, he plays and works hard. Jordan took his group through two sets of standards and originals, with perhaps the best work on the standards. A sincere version of "Stardust", and an up-tempo "Straight, No Chaser" were the highlights of the Poor script, but it was well acted

Ten Little Indians
Student Union Ballroom
Tuesday, May 7

All things considered, I enjoyed the UMass Theater Guild's last production of the spring semester, Agatha Christie's Ten Little Indians. Despite what I felt was a shabby, shabby script without fully-developed characters, the cast of 11 managed to sustain some level of humor and suspense throughout Tuesday's performance.

Ten Little Indians is a murder mystery concerning ten people of different sectors of society, all of whom have some connection to someone's death. The play is very conversational, with virtually all of the "action" taking place in one spot — the living room of an island mansion they have all been invited to. As the play begins, each person is innocent and likeable enough, until a mysterious announcement is played over the stereo pronouncing each's suspected guilt. Soon people are dropping like flies, and more and more you realize how many moral flaws each one has.

I think one of the best things this production achieved was a total equanimity of suspicion among the characters. As the killings started taking place, clues piled up and the tension built, each character seemed equally puzzled and scared, making it impossible to choose one over the other as the murderous perpetrator. But while that was an intriguing mind-boggler for a time, it couldn't make up for the blatant stupidity of most of the lines — I just couldn't imagine real people saying these things. The psychology of each character was too simple to be interesting, and the dialogue was rarely lively. This was, I felt, too great a barrier for the actors to overcome. Many times I could sense their struggle to get involved in their lines which didn't reveal much about their characters; consequently I wasn't very involved for much of the play.

There were several very credible aspects of the play, though, that were really enjoyable. For instance, the actors reached in and found the slapstick and physical humor in the seemingly straight lines. The interplay between Rob Corddry (Phillip Lombard) and Craig Parker (William Blore) was a funny exploration of animosity between insecure macho studs. Jerusha Maurer was hysterically moral and evil as the Church Ladylike Emily Brent, especially when from out of nowhere she started to roar bible passages. Steve Olivo played a consistently dippy hotshot college boy who only regretted running over two children in his car because his license was temporarily suspended. Joe O'Conner's role as the overly stern, general with a penchant for uncontrolled explosions of anger was wonderful — his quirky mannerisms and shaky reactions to everything had us all laughing, until he was knifed. The fullest performances were given by Cutter Garcia as the servant Rogers and Tom Berry as Judge Wargrave. Garcia skillfuly turned from a wiseguy into an evening.

While the play was solid, and at times even engrossing, the youth of Jordan would always seem to creep through. It was easy to see the influences on his quintet, Elvin Jones, McCoyt Tyner, Coltrane, Ron Carter. Both Jordan and his sidemen did justice to them all. Yet this is the trend with younger jazz musicians today that worries me. There is absolutely nothing wrong with being influenced by Coltrane or Davis at age twenty, but one needs to also listen to Bird, Dizzy, Clifford Brown, Dexter Gordon, Charlie Rouse, and many other musicians who have made honest contributions to the music through their unique sounds. The "cool" jazz that came out of the 60s seems to have almost an overbearing influence on today's young players while the improvisational mastery of bebop from the 40s and 50s seems to be lying dormant.

The key for today's young musicians, such as Marlon Jordan, is to listen to everything they can, and then incorporate all those ideas into their own sound. I don't mean to make this seem an easy task, for it is not, no musician is ever satisfied with their ability. And at age twenty, Jordan has more than enough time to find his niche. But today's young players needs to remember their history, and learn about all those who have come before them in order to gain a sound that is truly unique.

One cannot be an innovator all of the time, and at times it is good to play in the mold of someone else. The important thing is knowing when to start blazing your own trail. With Marlon Jordan, his time will come.

■ Ten Little Indians

emotional wreck following the murder of his wife, and Berry was a complete surprise as the murderer. He played the just and contemplative mediator right up to the end when he turned hilariously homicidal and psychopathic.

That brings me to my favorite part of the show: it's ending. When finally it looked as if the coice of a murderer was down to only Lombard and Vera Claythorne (Christianna Pearce), Vera appeared to kill Lombard with a revolver. Then we heard a terrifying cackle and in came Judge Wargrave, blood smeared all over his face, in a black justice's robe, giving a deliciously sick speech about how he loves killing and how ingenious he is. He then dragged Vera around the room, being completely psychotic — it was the most real, scary scene in the play, and ended with an appropriate BANG! as Lombard came back from the dead and saved Vera with a single shot. And even more to the actor's credit, the first time Vera tried to shoot Lombard, the gun jammed, and the actors had to improvise a whole other scene while keeping up the tension, which they did — I only discovered their cover-up after the show ended.

So despite a script that lacked a crucial third dimension to it's characterization and it's tension, the cast worked to give an audience of 300 an entertaining and suspenseful evening.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Enjoy the last day of your vacation. Watch out for cat hair on your clothing. Why not call a friend you haven't spoken to in a while to go to the Pond Concert Sunday? You can da your thesis on Saturday.
TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Go ahead and enjoy a new arrangement or pruchase. Those who work at home can make record profits now. A difference of opinion with loved one could lead to a showdown. Remain calm.
GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Try perking up your diet with some fresh veggies ... like zucchini. A relative offers help, but there could be strings attached. Think twice before entering into binding agreements.
CANCER (June 21-July 22): Retrench and adopt a more conservative attitude toward a work project. A phone call or letter supplies the missing piece to a puzzle. Be careful not to neglect your domestic obligations.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): A business matter takes an unexpected turn. You profit from making a small investment. Some difficult decisions lie ahead. Count on loved ones to give you support when you need it most.
LIBRA (Sept 23-Oct 22): Seek expert advice on boosting profits. A lucrative project could be launched with the backing of a prominent person. New professional gains come if you stay on track.
SCORPIO (Oct 23-Nov 21): Your hard work and persistence begin to pay off. A promotion or raise is in the works. Affairs of the heart occupy your thoughts tonight. Be careful not to come on too strang.

CAPRICORN (Dec 22-Jan 19): Your first impression of a memeber of the opposite sex could be incorrect. Proceed carefully where career and financial matters are concerned. A neighbor or friend shares good news.
AQUARIUS (Jan 20-Feb 18): Your funny wit and mesmorizing personality ensure you long lasting friendships. Continue to work hard and keep a cheery disposition, your future holds many beautiful things. You are an awesome person.
PISCES (Feb 19-March 20): Call in your markers! Seek assistance from someone you have helped in the past. Entertaining at home saves money and impresses your guests. A loved one has a terrific money-making idea.

talent as any other team in the field," said coach Mike Stone before the team departed for Boyertown.

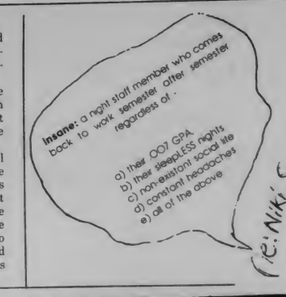
"But we need to be consistent," he added.

Consistency has been UMass' biggest obstacle all season. Perhaps the Minutemen peaked too soon; they were on a 15-5 run before finishing the season, losing four of their last six. Three separate chances to clinch the East title outright slipped out of their hands in that stretch.

Rich Graham, Scott Meaney and Ron Villone have all been dominant in stretches this year on the mound. Meaney has slipped a bit lately, but Graham has been rock-solid most of the season and Villone's fastball has proven that his foray into baseball wasn't just a scheme to avoid spring football practice. Villone could prove invaluable in relief situations if his location holds out.

UMass' offense is where most of the team's inconsistencies lie. The Minutemen have looked both potent and anemic at times offensively and, often, mistakes have cost them ballgames.

Considering the caliber of pitching they'll be facing, UMass needs to capitalize on the chances they get. If team-hitting leaders Derek Dana, Mike Tobin and Brian Bright can string together some hits and the UMass pitching staff holds tight, the Minutemen have a legitimate chance to win the whole thing. However, in a field as even as this year's, any inconsistencies may cost them.



Insane: a night staff member who comes back to work semester after semester regardless of -
a) their GOT GPA
b) their sleeplESS nights
c) non-existant social life
d) constant headaches
e) all of the above

Teams start A-10 tourney play in Pa. today

• Baseball faces tough, even field

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

Three wins. That's all the University of Massachusetts baseball team needs to win the Atlantic 10 Tournament and advance to the NCAA Regionals.

UMass' quest starts today at 4:05 p.m., as they take on A-10 West Division Champion Penn State at Bear Stadium in Boyertown, Pa. The Minutemen (24-23-1) are second in the A-10 East and have been looking forward to this day since roughly the same time last year, when Rutgers spoiled UMass' title game plans with a come-from-behind win. Here, then, is a look at this year's contestants in the A-10 Tourney. The field is balanced; any one of four teams could win it all and advance.

Penn State (24-18): The Nittany Lions put together a month-long string of torrid baseball, winning 15 of their last 18 games to take the A-10 West and knocking West Virginia out of the tournament.

This is Penn State's last A-10 Tourney before joining the Big 10, a conference more suited to the Nittany Lions' athlete factory mentality, so they may have extra incentive to win. PSU is 3-11 in six A-10 Tournament appearances.

Penn State's trump card is their pitching staff, which holds the A-10 team earned-run-average lead at 4.15.

Leading the way is recent Wilson/Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Week Chris Cisar. Cisar, a 6-foot left-hander, has a blistering 1.78 ERA and a recent no-hitter to his credit.

If Cisar weren't enough, right-hander Jeff Burris checks in with a 3.44 ERA and a 3-3 record.

However, pitching may be all PSU has. They only hit .288 as a team and have scored the fewest runs (216) in the entire conference. Only Duquesne has driven in fewer runs. If the Nittany Lions run into another strong pitching team that can bang out some runs against it's staff, they may be in trouble.

George Washington (30-24-1): The Colonials (30-24-1) held onto first place in the West until Penn State took 3-of-4 from them. It should be interesting to see if GWU can regain their composure after just missing the title.

GWU has traditionally put strong teams on the field, and this year looks like no exception with talent like Mike (.409) Welch and Greg (.393) Orlosky. These guys can really smack the ball; Welch has a conference-high .83 hits while Orlosky follows close behind with 79.

The Colonials also have the A-10's top pitcher in Bill Anderson. Anderson is 7-2 in 10 starts with six complete games and a 1.57 ERA. His control appears impeccable; he has 76 strikeouts to his credit and only 12 walks.

The rest of GWU's staff looks decent, but considering the strength of the Colonials' schedule, their 5.71 team ERA isn't so bad. If GWU can get past Rutgers in the first round, they might make some waves.

Rutgers (28-19-2): The Scarlet Knights are 12-0-1 in their last 13 games, including two wins over UMass which gave Rutgers the East title. So momentum is on their side. Rutgers also has experience at winning the A-10s — they won last year. The Scarlet Knights are third in A-10 pitching and hitting, have six starters hitting over .300 and a proven save man in Jim Kehl.

They have shored up their once-suspect fielding as well. Simply put, the Scarlet Knights make a good match for the rest of the field.

Jason Imperial, Angel Echevarria and Mike Winchok are Rutgers' prime offensive threats. Echevarria has a .411 average with runners in scoring position, while he and Imperial have hit a combined 16 home runs and driven in 76 total runs. Imperial was recently named Wilson/Atlantic 10 Player of the Week.

It should be interesting to see if Rutgers' batting order can prevail over the arm of GWU's Anderson in their first-round match-up tonight at 7:35 p.m.

They are No. 1 in the North.

They are No. 20 in the nation.

They are the University of Massachusetts softball team, and this weekend they are ready to rock Allentown, Pa., and the Atlantic 10 Championship Tournament.

UMass (35-11) is the favorite to win the tournament for the second consecutive year.

The Minutewomen became the first team in A-10 history to go through the regular season with a perfect 12-0 conference record. They are obviously the top seed.

Mounting challenges to UMass will be No. 2 seed Penn State (22-28, 8-3 in A-10), No. 3 Rutgers (23-20-1, 7-4) and No. 4 Temple (17-26-1, 6-6). UMass has soundly defeated all these teams twice this season.

Last month, Penn State traveled to Amherst and was shut down by the UMass pitching tandem of Darlene Claffey and Holly Aprile. The Minutewomen swept the Lions 2-0, 3-0. Penn State is lead by junior second baseman Joyce Tinner who is batting .329.

Also late in March, UMass pounded out 33 hits and earned 28 runs to destroy Rutgers 11-2, 17-0 in five innings.

Once again it was Claffey and Aprile who picked up the wins. Senior catcher Laurie McMahon leads the Knights with a .349 batting average and an A-10 leading six triples.

The No. 4 seed Temple Owls could fair no better as they were blown away, 6-1, 13-3. Temple relies on freshman Angela Prinos to lead them at the plate. Prinos has 13 doubles and is batting .354.

For those of you keeping score at home, UMass is 6-0 against fellow tournament teams, outscoring the threesome by a combined score of 52-6.

Obviously for UMass, returning with anything less than the championship would be a disappointment.

The double-elimination tournament begins today as UMass squares off against Temple at 6 p.m.

Rutgers will play Penn State at 8 p.m.

The championship game will be played Sunday at 1 p.m.

The Minutewomen stand a good chance to bring home more hardware then just the A-10 Championship trophy.

The A-10 will hold their annual awards banquet today. Player of the Year and Pitcher of the Year will be awarded and UMass has strong candidates in both categories.

Shortstop Barbara Marean is the likely winner in the Player of the Year voting. Marean batted .445 during the regular season and hit six home runs.

She knocked in 34 RBI and hit five triples. All these statistics either lead or are in the top three in the A-10.

Marean also played stellar defense, ending the season with a .919 fielding percentage. The senior provided some strong leadership on a young team.

As for Pitcher of the Year, UMass has two viable candidates. Claffey is 19-5 on the season with a 1.07 ERA. She has been dominating of late, winning 12 of her last 13.

She has struck out 103 batters this season while holding them to a .171 batting average. Claffey has a remarkable 15 shutouts and four no-hitters.

Also a candidate is the other half of the UMass rotation, Aprile. She went 16-6 this season, allowing opponents to bat only .179 against her. She has seven shutouts and her ERA is 1.18.

Aprile has won seven of her last eight and her last three outings have resulted in shutouts. Her only loss during that streak was a 14 inning, 3-2 decision to Connecticut's Kim Mizesko.

This weekend could be one to remember for UMass. The Minutewomen have a lot to lose if they trip up along the way but, more likely, they will win a lot of games and a lot of trophies.

Strong field awaits track at NEs

By BRIAN AGUIAR

Laces are being tied and spikes are being tightened as the University of Massachusetts women's track and field team sets out to Northeastern for the New England Track and Field Championships.

Originally set at Tufts then moved to Boston College, it was learned the Eagles were graduating in the stadium scheduled for the weekend competition, so the meet landed at Northeastern.

Over 500 athletes from the Big East and Ivy League will compete this year in New Englands.

This is the first year in quite a while that the Ivies and Big East have competed in this event. Normally, those leagues have their league competition the same weekend New Englands are held.

And although UMass took third last year, those additional competitors may explain why UMass coach Julie LaFreniere said she would be happy to finish in the top 10.

Connecticut and Brown are favored to win and will vie for the top spot while Boston University and Northeastern will compete for third and fourth place, according to LaFreniere.

On Friday, Diane Ozzolek will throw the hammer. She has thrown a personal best of 151 feet, 6 inches this season.

Simone Marisseau aims to beat her record of 40-11 1/2, according to LaFreniere, when she puts the shot.

Kathy Hennessy, who has high jumped between 5-2 and 5-4 will also compete Friday.

Lennice Johnson, who has been plagued by a thyroid condition and anemia, will run the 400 hurdles on Saturday.

"She's looked good in practice all week," LaFreniere said. She added that Johnson has run the event in .65 but has clocked in at .63. LaFreniere said Johnson has clocked better times in practice since she has been off medication that made her drowsy.

"In the first 200 she would blow everyone away but then fade out," LaFreniere said of Johnson in previous meets. "She looks 100 percent better."

Cate Dean and Kathy Holt will run the 10 kilometer on Saturday. Dean has posted a personal best of 40 minutes, 4 seconds while Holt has run a 40:40. They have run this distance only once this season in March when there was a snowstorm, according to LaFreniere.

Lynn Kirchoff and Mo Meldrim will run the 5,000-meter race, will best times of 18:23 and 17:38. Meldrim was ranked third in this distance in New England during the indoor track season.

Kelly Liljeblad has run the 3,000 in 10:10 and LaFreniere said she will try to qualify for the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Championship by hitting 9:57.

Tana Henderson and Lisa Tramontana will run the 200-meter dash and Dana Smith will follow with the 400.

Cathy Crocker, Michelle St. Laurent and LeeAnn Ambrose will compete in the 800. Ambrose's best time of 2:10.3 is two-tenths of a second shy of the school record in that event.

The 4 x 400 relay, where fast is never fast enough, Johnson will hand off to Crocker after the first leg and Dana Smith and Ambrose will come around, respectively.

Because this is the last meet of the year for most of the team, New Englands are a focal point throughout the season.

LaFreniere said she believes her athletes will rise to the level of the competition like the team did in the Penn Relays where school records were broken. She said the team is striving for personal and school records again this weekend and hopes to end the season with a strong kick.

Dylan 'Disshelved,' swan miffed

Thousands converge on pond concert

By DANIELLE DOWLING
Collegian Staff

Members of Chucklehead model the latest in trendy hats at yesterday's Pond Concert.

Mr. Swan was miffed yesterday.

On a hot spring afternoon, the last thing he wanted to deal with was thousands of people and loud music disturbing his humble environment. He took his frustrations out on any duck that had the unfortunate circumstance of swimming in his way.

He was not the only living being filled with frustration that day, but the explanation for that will come later.

The 1991 Pond Concert, the bane of Mr. Swan's exsistance, started off a little after noon with the energetic funk of Chucklehead. Donning funky, day-glo garb (the lead singer's collection of hats was extremely interesting, to say the least), they played a tight set of powerhouse funk that would make George Clinton shake and wiggle his buttocks.

After their opener "Intro Soul," they played an interesting piece that mixed a couple of samples from everyone's favorite game show Jeopardy and was appropriately titled as such. "Book" proved that these boys can rap and had a hyperkinetic stamina that was only equalled by their closing song, "Outbound," a song which was introduced by one band member telling the crowd of about 200-300 people, "We have one more song for you tonight."

Chucklehead left the stage receiving much enthusiatic appaulse; the crowd grew; fried dough and other such yummy treats were purchased; it was time for the Feelies; Mr. Swan was thrilled.

The Feelies were introduced by a small child, who was wriggling to free himself from almost certain embarrassment that would be caused by stating to the crowd, "Ladies and Gentlemen, the Feelies."

The crowd in front of the stage that had dissipated between sets, surged forth, something that would be repeated throughout the concert.

Often cited for their undaunted fixation with the Velvet Underground, it is interesting to note that the two drummers for the Feelies had the same type of drum kit that their idol, Moe Tucker, had, which must have come in handy when they played their second encore, a cover version of Velvet Underground's, "White Light, White Heat." They did a couple of other covers as well: "Barstool Blues" by Neil Young; "Paint It Black" by the Rolling Stones; and "Real Cool Time" by the Stooges which is also on their latest album Time for a Witness.

Most of the material they played yesterday consisted of songs off their recent release with a sprinkle of oldies, but goodies. "Doing it Again" and "Boy with Perpetual Nervousness," songs which cultivated astonishing rhythmic intensity and catchy, uplifting melodies, were perhaps the best tunes of the 18-song set. And definite major kudos go to Brenda Sauter who played a mean bass.

After the Feelies left, things went downhill, the crowd grew to about 2,000 in size and Mr. Swan was becoming increasingly upset.

"Why?" you ask. Because it was time for Gene Loves Jezebel. Admittedly, they put on a better performance than one could expect from them. For the first four or five songs, they were as loose as someone's bowels after digesting camel laxative, but at least they wore colorful costumes to hold the crowd's interest. Progressively, they tightened themselves and by the time they played their one hit, albeit annoying, entitled, "Jealous," they were somewhat worthy of respect.

They came back for the obligatory encore saying, "Bob said we could do one more," and then breaking out into "Desire." They had referred to the song earlier in the set saying, "That's another song title that U2 stole from us." That's really funny coming from a band that persists in stealing old, boring, tired pop formulas from other bands.

Now we had to wait for Bob. The intermission was spent in silence — no music, unlike the other intermissions. The photographers had been told not to take pictures of Mr. Dylan, so vicious gossip mongers were creating tales that Dylan was part of of satanic cult and therefore frightened by thought of having his image captured on film. But he was gracious enough to play his set before schedule, since De La Soul was stuck in traffic somewhere between New Jersey and Amherst, so rumors of his evil ego were soon put down.

The crowd cheered two false alarms before their shout of adulation greeted the real thing. Dylan, reportedly resembling a shriveled apple, played his guitar and mummbled real well for the crowd of approximately 7,000-8,000 people. All that could be remembered from the first tune was the marvelous smell of skunk weed floating about. "Lay Lady Lay" was almost irrecognizable, due in part to the heavy guitar crunching of Dylan's protege, as was his folk improvisation of "Blowing in the Prosecutor says alleged victim will be shielded

By DAN SEWELL

PALM BEACH, Fla. — Aided by strict state rules, prosecutors in the sexual battery case against William Kennedy Smith will try to protect his accuser against having her personal life put on trial.

"We need women to know they can report the crime of rape without invasion of their privacy," said Palm Beach County State Attorney, David Bludworth.

But Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz, a prominent constitutional law expert, has predicted the defense team will test Florida's rape-victim protection laws while assailing the woman's credibility.

Smith's Miami lawyer, Mark Schnapp, did not return repeated telephone calls seeking comment about possible strategy.

Bludworth announced Thursday that while charging Smith, the 30-year old nephew of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) with second-degree sexual battery and battery, he also was prosecuting the supermarket tabloid the Globe for identifying the alleged victim in apparent violation of a 1911 state law.

Smith surrendered to police on Saturday, and after being booked, he was released on $10,000 bail.

Florida has strict rules of evidence in rape cases, most recently tightened after the 1989 acquittal of a suspect by a Broward County jury whose foreman said she virtually asked for the attack by wearing a miniskirt and no panties.

The legislature passed a law prohibiting introduction of evidence about supposedly promiscuous dress by a victim.

During the six-week investigation of the March 30 report, Bludworth repeatedly said he considers rape a worsening problem in Florida and that it's the most under-reported crime.

The woman's name was disclosed April 15 by The Globe and in subsequent days by NBC, The New York Times and other papers.

The number of Palm Beach County women requesting rape exams dropped from 10 in the April 1 - April 17 time period to one the rest of the month, said Kris Karna, supervisor of the county's sexual assault program.

Bludworth criticized news reporting of the 29-year-old woman's past.

The woman's lawyer, David Roth, also blasted a "a blatant invasion" of her privacy by the news media.

"There certainly have been enormous misrepresentations, falsehoods and lies in the media concerning my client's background and the alleged facts of the incident," Roth said late last week.

John Namey, a former prosecutor from Orlando, said Smith's lawyers apparently want to make the trial his word against hers while attacking her character.

"That's what every defense attorney wants in these cases," he said.

Smith, a medical student at Georgetown University, has denied wrongdoing. He has neither confirmed nor denied having intercourse with the woman, who likely will be challenged about whether she consented to sex and about her truthfulness.

ALLENTOWN, Pa. — In the regular season the University of Massachusetts softball team rolled all over Atlantic-10 competition. It wasn't quite that easy this weekend but the Minutewomen left Allentown with their third straight A-10 Championship title.

Yesterday UMass survived a late onslaught by Rutgers to win the Championship Game 5-4. The win was a combination of the tough pitching of Darlene Claffey (21-5) and timely hitting.

In the early innings it was all UMass, with the Minutewomen leading 5-0 after three innings and Claffey cruising, mowing down seven straight Scarlet Knights. However, Rutgers rallied to get an unearned run in the fourth and struck for three more in the fifth to make it a game.

In the top of the first, UMass started off with a bang, scoring two runs. Cherrie DellAnno got on base due to an error by first baseman Jen Fowler who dropped the ball when Jen Miller sacrificed. Sheri Kuchinskas tried to sacrifice but DellAnno was forced out at third. Up came A-10 Player of the Year Holly Aprile, who doubled deep to right bringing in both teammates.

In the second, Bonnie Schilling singled to right center and was pinch run by Tiffany Hodson. Hodson moved to second on a Tracy Duest sacrifice then to third on a Claffey grounder on the right side. DellAnno drew a walk and Sortino utilized her team speed to manufacture a run. DellAnno stole second and, as catcher Laurie McMahon threw to second, Hodson rounded third to score.

A perfect call and perfect execution and it was quickly 3-0, UMass.

Claffey held strong in the third and, with

Iranian women on Western forefront

TEHRAN, Iran (AP) — Designer scarves peek around veils and gold bracelets dangle just beneath the long sleeves. Eyes, lips and nails show a hint of color.

Iran's slow reopening to the West is most visible in its women, who have become a barometer of religious and political tolerance.

Despite the small changes, however, Iranian women still are threatened by enforcers of the Islamic code, who can arrest anyone they feel is offending the faith.

Women who were adults before the fundamentalist revolution of 1979 say the slight liberalization introduced by President Hashemi Rafsanjani is just window dressing for a theocracy that has little desire to change their lives significantly.

"It's getting a little bit better, but, practically, I don't believe that things will change," said Anahita, a 38-year-old former financial manager who works as an interpreter. "To me, it seems more propaganda."

She and several women friends, all professionals, were spending the day at home in the mountains north of Tehran. All spoke on condition of anonymity.

Their fear indicates how much remains the same in the revolutionary Iran founded by the late Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeni.

Every month, the women gather at someone's home and shed their sober outer garments, revealing coiffed hair, painted toenails and designer fashions.

On this day the hostess was Efat, a wealthy widow with two children who also owns a farm and a house in Tehran.

"The women are trying to find a way, trying to find some place for themselves, maybe not in their profession, but by organizing parties, in the social life," Anahita said. She sat cross-legged on a blanket in the garden, wearing jeans, a yellow T-shirt and blue hiking boots.

Since Khomeini died in June 1989, Rafsanjani has lessened the revolution's Islamic fervor as he tries to move Iran from isolation to better relations with the West. Rakical fundamentalists fight him at every step.

Anahita said publishing was one area that had opened up for women. She and several colleagues have just finished a historical review of women's role in Persian culture and hope to publish it soon.

Zahra was a prominent lawyer during the pro-Western reign of the late Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi, who was overthrown by Khomeini's revolution. She lost her practice and was able to resume it only three weeks ago.

Her clients are guided by her legal advice, but it is her male colleague's signature that counts.

"It was very hard for her to lose her professional job, but it didn't stop her," said Anahita, who translated Zahra's story into English. "What she's doing now is the least, but she is working in her profession."

Anahita spoke of the "many contradictions" about women's place in Iranian society.

"You can find women in key professional positions and women who are not able to work at all," she said.

For example, several sit in the 270-member parliament.

Women are constantly alert for members of the Komiteh, revolutionary guardians who patrol neighborhoods, enforcing strict Islamic law. A woman can be arrested, beaten, even stoned for touching a man who is not a relative, for having her head or body uncovered or for wearing makeup or jewelry.

Crackdowns occur periodically and arbitrarily. The women reported several Komiteh raids over the past month as the government admitted foreign observers and journalists because of the influx of Kurdish refugees from Iraq.

Komiteh guards raided several private parties, detaining some female guests, and "arrested some women who were wearing makeup" in a downtown building that houses several multinational corporations, Anahita said.

She said there were reports that the women were whipped, fined and forced to sign pledges to observe the Islamic dress code.

Rallies mark Mother's Day

By CHRIS TORCHIA
Associated Press

BOSTON — Mother's Day was not all flowers and phone calls yesterday for about 100 activists who rallied for breast cancer research and a stop to abuse of women worldwide.

Speakers at a City Hall gathering told how breast cancer is more lethal than AIDS, killing about 44,500 women each year. They urged the U.S. Congress to pass House Resolution 381, which would give $25 million more for research into the cancer.

"What's the matter with the men in Washington?" said city councilor Rosaria Salerno. "Where the hell are the Schwarzkopfs and Powells to deal with breast cancer?"

At another event on the Boston Common, protesters complained that the United States spent vast sums on the Gulf War while ignoring the neglect suffered by millions of mothers.

Members of the Women's Community Cancer Project, which organized the rally for medical research, said breast cancer cases are increasing despite traditional treatments as surgery and chemotherapy. They said one in nine American women will get breast cancer, compared to one in 20 in 1960.

"The only reason I will survive is because of my own will," said 38-year-old Michelle Kraynak, who had cancer in both breasts. "It will have nothing to do with medicine."

Kraynak said her mammogram, an X-ray test for breast tumors, failed to detect cancer after she noticed a lump in her breast in 1989. She underwent a year of chemotherapy, but had to undergo surgery when she found a lump in her other breast.

"It got to the point where I was not productive," said Kraynak, who had worked as a sales representative, but is now unemployed. "It was a financial burden on me."

Her cancer is in remission, but she is bitter doctors couldn't detect the disease earlier or give her preventive treatment.

"It's good to be here on Mother's Day because mothers are women and women are the people being hurt by this," said 12-year-old Erica Cole.

The rally on the common was held by the Union of Palestinian Women's Associations of North America. Protestors singled out President Bush and Gov. Weld for ignoring poor mothers who could end up on the streets because of federal and state welfare cuts.

"I'm not a mother, of course," said Jack McCambridge, director of the Homeless Civil Rights Project in Boston. "But I would imagine that to them today might seem like a travesty."

Ron Capling, a 48-year-old energy conservationist, took his criticism a step further.

"I feel really alienated from other white males," Capling said. "I feel really grossed out by what white men are like by and large in this society. They're into sports or making money."

for over 1300 units of blood this year.

What good is a blood donor?

A blood donor is good for people who go though windshields and red lights. For somebody with leukemia. For people being operated on. For people into feudin' and fightin'. For hemophiliacs so they can be as normal as possible. For daredevils. For people undergoing dialysis while waiting for a kidney transplant. For people who fool around with guns. For little kids who manage to uncap a bottle full of something poisonous. For people who are burned pretty bad. For new mothers needing a transfusion. For people having open heart surgery. For cancer patients. For people with a severe case of hepatitis. For anybody any age with bleeding ulcers. For people in the wrong place at the wrong time. For people who run into things. For people who are in a lot worse shape than most people you know.

And a special Thank You to all of the UMASS sponsors who reached out to others to meet our goal.

Shevardnadze speaks at BU commencement

BOSTON (AP) — The defeat of despotism in the Persian Gulf and spiritual ties between the Soviet and American people offer hope for a unified world, Eduard Shevardnadze, the former Soviet foreign minister, said Sunday at Boston University's commencement.

"The crisis in the Persian Gulf demonstrated the decisive role of technological progress, knowledge, professionalism and competance," Shevardnadze said. "But is also demonstrated that victory is on tenth side of freedom."

At Tufts University, graduates were treated to the romantic duo of broadcasting mogul Ted Turner and film star Jane Fonda at the school's commencement. Turner, the main speaker, also referred to the Persian Gulf War, saying that he hoped intensive news coverage showed war was not the way to resolve conflicts.

At BU, Shevardnadze said the world had undergone great changes, including the end of the Cold War and the conflict in the Gulf.

"Totalitarianism, once again, suffered a defeat," he said through a translator. "And, it seems to me, that the Near East was the last trial of strength between democracy and despotism."

Shevardnadze, who is in the United States for the first time since resigning in December, said Soviet citizens and their U.S. counterparts understand the importance of a world civilization.

"Soviet and American people are very close to one another spiritually," he said.

Shevardnadze's upbeat speech contrasted in part with his comment Friday that the Soviet Union is moving away from democracy. The former minister left his post to protest the recent military crackdown in the Baltic Republics.

More than 5,400 undergraduates and graduate students received degrees at BU's 118th commencement.

Shevardnadze received an honorary doctor of law degree. Other honorary degrees went to ABC News Presdent Roone Arledge; Col. Jesse Gregory Adamian, president of special operations in the Persian Gulf War; Aubrey Fook-Wo Li, chairman of Chase National Bank; and David Riesman, a Harvard sociologist and leading authority on higher education.

Shevardnadze, who is on a month-long U.S. tour, currently heads the Foreign Policy Association, a Soviet non-government organization that evaluates foreign policy issues.

Turner, the main speaker at Tufts, told more than 2,100 graduates that their generation will face humanity's greatest crisis, but will also realize its greatest opportunities.

Alluding to the war coverage, Turner said he felt "a little discouraged" by the pictures of "cruelty, death and disaster."

"But hopefully," he added, "the fact that we were able to see so much of it — and see how terrible it was — will be another lesson to us that war is not the way to accomplish things."

Turner, whose Cable News Network attracted a wide audience during the Persian Gulf War, received an honorary doctor of humane letters. He was accompanied by Fonda, his girlfriend, who sat in a front-row section reserved for dignitaries.

Tufts also awarded six other honorary at its 135th commencement. The receipients were:

- Harry Belafonte, the actor and entertainer who has campaigned for civil rights.
- Dr. Etienne-Emile Baulieu, the French scientist who initiated research for an anti-pregnancy pill being used in France and China.
- Dick Francis, the British mystery novelist and former jockey.
- Dr. Mamphela Ramphele, a South African physcian and civil rights leader.

Condoms, spermicides? Dr. Abel doesn't blush

By MORGAN BITTON
Collegian Staff

"You can't make me blush," said Dr. Jim Abel of University Health Services at a Just Say Know workshop on sex education and birth control. "I challenge you to do so. Anybody who makes me blush gets a dozen condoms or the spermicide of their choice — or both."

"Tonight we're going to talk about sex," explains Abel to a group of about 45 students sitting on couches, tables and the floor of a Patterson lounge. "We're here to talk about sexual things, not moral issues. Whether it's right or wrong good or bad. You'll have to decide for yourself. We're just going to talk about sex."

For almost three hours Abel stands in front of a table filled with over two dozen condoms of different brands, sizes, textures and flavors, spermicides, lubricants and gels in more than 10 varieties, diaphragms ranging in sizes and piles of pamphlets on sexually transmitted diseases and birth control.

Before beginning his discussion, Abel passes out slips of paper for students to write down questions they would like answered, if they are too embarrassed to ask them aloud. Skimming through the pile of questions, he said, "looking through these questions I can tell that 90 percent of them have to do with orgasms."

Sexual behavior and attitudes among University of Massachusetts students are not much different from other college age students in the United States, Abel said.

According to a recent study of 16,861 students at colleges nationwide, including UMass, 1,500 students carry the HIV virus. Unwanted pregnancies and sexually transmitted dieases are prevalent, Abel said.

Through workshops, programs and counselling, students are made more aware of the options available and the precautions they can take, he said. While these attempts have been successful in increasing awareness, problems in properly using contraception and prophylactics still remain, he said.

In 1985, University Health Services treated 844 patients for sexually transmitted diseases, according to a UHS fact sheet. In 1990, 2,135 students were treated. Veneral warts and chlamydia diagnoses have both doubled while cases of gonorrhea have decreased by almost 75 percent, the fact sheet stated.

A short man with a big grin hidden behind a gray beard, Abel bounces in front of his audience. He uses diagrams, props and sometimes unexpectedly calls on viewers to answer questions. He said he wants students to be able to ask him anything they want about sex.

Drawing both male and female genitals on a large piece of paper, he tells the audience, "We're going to have an orgasm both as a man and a woman."

He then takes the group through the phases of an orgasm, visually pointing at the diagrams and the sensitive areas of the body at each point leading through the orgasm. At the same time, he is charting a graph of pleasure at each of the stages, both for male and female. Occasionally he asks the audience what to do next. "You're a bunch of amateurs," he said, when no response is heard, "It's a shame I have to teach you these things."

Abel conducts Just Say Know as an informal type of workshop in an atmosphere where students are made to feel comfortable asking questions. He encourages his audience to ask questions in their own words.

"When I was your age I used to talk like you," he says, then quickly blurts out a list of words, "tits and balls and penis and pussy and fuck and score and scoop," while the somewhat surprised audience look around at others respond before they laugh and giggle.

Abel said his goal is to be able to have students be able to feel comfortable talking about sex, "I'm old but I am not that old." He said he wants students to realize that he understands their sexual behavior.

"It was like deja vu," he said. "I saw they're still making the same mistakes I made. I don't find it hard to relate to them sexually."

Abel offers his views and advice on sex, birth control and prevention of sexually transmitted diseases. His goal is to teach "smart sex," not "safe sex," which he calls "a bunch of buzzwords, pretty posters and

Tsongas, Duke linked

By CECI CONNOLLY
Associated Press

BOSTON — So, have you heard the one about the Democrats in 1992? They're thinking of nominating another liberal Greek from Massachusetts for president.

From comedian Jay Leno to President Bush's top aides to the candidate himself, people are making the inevitable cracks about the presidential candidacy of Paul Tsongas, the second Greek Democrat from the Bay State to run in as many elections.

The ledger shows significant differences between Tsongas and former Democratic nominee Michael Dukakis. But in the world of politics, where perception is everything, Tsongas is likely to be spending much of his time trying to escape the shadow of Dukakis.

"They both come from the same wing of the party," said former state Rep. John Flood, one of the few Massachusetts Democrats to criticize Dukakis during the 1988 campaign. "This just furthers the feeling of a Northeast, liberal, elitist group who seem to think they're right for the presidency."

Draw a line down the center of a blank sheet of paper, listing Dukakis on one side and Tsongas on the other, and many of the same phrases appear in both columns. Phrases like "abortion rights," "no PAC money," "early reformer," "gun control," "bland," "decent," "Ivy Leaguer." Both men are the sons of Greek immigrants, although Tsongas grew up in the working-class city of Lowell and Dukakis in the more affluent Brookline.

And Tsongas is likely to be haunted by images and words forever linking the two. Recall famous scenes of the 1988 race:

In Lowell, Dukakis and Tsongas invited the national media to Lowell to witness the "Massachusetts Miracle" in action.

"We were getting irritated by those who say that Michael Dukakis had nothing to do with the 'Massachusetts Miracle,'" Tsongas said.

By that fall, Tsongas was needed again: this time to defend Dukakis' environmental record as Bush lobbed an assault from a boat in the polluted Boston Harbor.

Lou DiNatale, of the University of Massachusetts' McCormack Institute, said comparing the two is like splitting hairs.

"While Tsongas may be a more updated, modernized version, he's still from the same roots," he said.

But Tsongas' campaign aides find any serious links with Dukakis specious at best.

"People will judge Paul on his own," said campaign manager Dennis Kanin. "We did not spend a lot of time thinking about [this]. I'm not sure it's meaningful; he's not running against Dukakis."

On the issues, Tsongas points to several areas where he is more conservative than Dukakis. He supports nuclear power and the death penalty for drug dealers. Dukakis opposed the death penalty and wavered on nuclear power.

In other areas, Tsongas said he is more progressive, taking an early lead in the fight for gay rights and protecting the environment. He wrote the Alaska Lands Act in 1980 and fought to limit development in Cape Cod.

The most significant differences though revolve around the economy.

Although Dukakis had "Export '90s" and "good jobs at good wages," Tsongas has made economic goals the centerpiece of his campaign in his manifesto "A Call to Economic Arms." "The fact is we are sending this book to every CEO and every director of Fortune 500 companies," Tsongas said. "No Democrat I ever heard of would have done that."

Forces fire on farmers

By TINA SUSMAN
Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — A small army of white farmers broke though a blockade Saturday and tried to flatten a black squatter camp with trucks, and two were wounded when security forces fired, police said.

The farmers said they were fired upon without warning. Police accused them of assaulting the black settlers.

In a separate incident, 17 blacks were injured when white attackers rampaged through a nearby black township, police said. Farmers denied involvement in that incident.

Reports of the member of injuries and the number of farmers involved varied, but all side agreed that whites wanted to get rid of about 300 blacks who had set up camp on land they lost under apartheid.

The incident underscored the anger many conservative whites have toward President F.W. de Klerk's plans to abolish apartheid laws that have reserved most land for the white minority. Many whites are now fearful they will have to give the land back to blacks, who were force to leave it.

The confrontation began shortly after midnight Friday near Ventersdoro, a conservative farming town 80 miles west of Johannesburg.

Last Saturday afternoon, Law and Order Minister Adriaan Vlok told reporters in Ventersdoro that farmers had agreed to leave the squatters alone and let the courts decide if they should be evicted.

Police Maj. Ray Harrald said police and soldiers were deployed to Ventersdoro after noticing a large contingent of vehicles moving toward the squatter camp late Friday.

"A roadblock was set up and the group. . . took up a position opposite the security force contingent and displayed a hostile attitude," Harrald said.

The farmers broke through the blockade early Saturday and began mowing down shacks with their trucks, using rifles and tear gas, Harrald said. He said three farmers were arrested and four shacks were damaged.

Harrald also said residents of the nearby black township of Tshing told police that whites armed with knives and sticks had rampaged in the township and injured 17 people. Residents said the attackers struck about 5 a.m. and wore knitted hats called balaclavas.

Hundreds of farmers gathered on a farm Saturday afternoon and spoke to reporters. Some wore balaclvas.

The South African Press Association initially said 500 farmers in 150 trucks were involved in the advance on the squatter camp.

The farmers said they wanted to peacefully remove the squatters and were shot at as they drove their trucks toward the camp. A leader of the group, Wilco Beukes, said they farmers never entered to camp or had contact with squatters.

practical advice which doesn't work." While smart sex is, "Just say know. Know what the hell you're talking about. Know what you're doing and know how to do it."

Abel starts to discuss what he feels is most important, "We'll talk about contraceptives and prophylactics which prevent diseases. I have some condoms here that you're going to steal and you'll probably take every one of them. Smart sex means being aware of the choices of contraceptives and prophylactics available and how to use them properly. Contraception alone does not prevent diseases."

He begins with discussing condoms. "If you are sexually active, gentlemen and carry condoms, I urge you to carry spermicides or you are only half a man." He warns his audience that condoms are frequently used improperly. If put on incorrectly, they can easily rip or tear. The detergents in spermicides provide extra protection both against disease and pregnancy.

He extended his thumb and said, "probably the smallest penis in the room." He put the condom on his thumb to demonstrate the proper way to use a condom on. Despite the fact that many men may complain about how condoms fit or feel, Abel says they can fit any shape or size penis. As he stretches a condom, arms outstretched over twelve inches, he disputes the argument that condoms "are not long enough" blowing up a condom he disproves the claim of "it's not wide enough."

"Condoms are fun, they're awesome," he said, "They come in over 250 kinds." In order to find out which you like best Abel suggests "practice." He also urges use of condoms during oral sex. As he randomly rips open condom packages sticking them in his mouth to taste, sometimes as if eating a piece of chewing gum, he spits out the ones with unpleasant flavor and warns "all Lifestyle condoms taste awful. Sheik Elite mint flavor are the best." Most of the audience laughs, while a few sit staring, somewhat shocked. "What's so terrible about putting condoms in your mouth? You played with balloons when you were little."

International media devoid of any moral responsibility

The helicopter descended on the sunken islands and devastated coastal communities of Bangladesh like a perverse metallic angel of death. Inside the cockpit, amid the hisses and pops of two-way radio, the reporter's distraught voice, its English composure beginning to melt, described the waterlogged cemetery bellow.

Instantly relayed back to base, the transmission was beemed upward and bounced off the obliging satellite to fall back to earth and around the world, feeding the consumers of information.

Tens of thousands of people, waist deep in water as far as they could see, running toward every helicopter, every speedboat, that bore the journalists to the Sea Of Death, were turned away to embrace Davey Jones, told to lie back in their coffin of sea and silt. The journalists were clearly upset at being "put in" this position but, they argued, what could they do? A rescue effort for a few would have been overwhelmed and only would have added to the numbers in that mass grave in the bay. So they gawked, scribbled and filmed, and flew or speed away, leaving the little brown dots fading in the distance.

The cliche that we are living in a "global village" is increasingly true, but only for those in the North or in the middle-class, metropolitan areas of the South. To join the community you have to be plugged in, so to speak. And it is becoming increasingly clear that some of the greatest power in this hamlet of abstraction is vested in those who control the direction of its collective gaze.

CNN, with its remote satellite broadcast units and "worldwide" distribution network, along with the other high priests of international media manipulation and global surveillance are mighty indeed. During the Gulf war, jokes abounded about how Bush and/or Saddam were fixated on Turner's titan. Many a true word...

Hussein Ibish

Like the Jacobean court mask, international media reporting is fixed in the gaze of the powerful and, in turn, fixes their gaze in a certain direction. It weaves a web of interdependency of power. For the individual, what we know depends on what they tell us. And those who live outside the walls of this feudal structure are fresh out of luck.

The suffering of the Kurds was prominently covered, for a time, when it was a useful reinforcement of the "why we went to war" mind massage, and when it made good drama. Now that the issues have been revealed as too complex to contribute to jingoism, and the public is presumed to be "bored," the program has been canceled.

After "Band-Aid" and "Live-Aid" the public is also presumed to be bored with famines in the horn of Africa, so the fact that one million people are facing immanent starvation in Ethiopia/Tigrae/Eritrea and up to 20 million are threatened in the near future is not to be found contaminating our TV screens. "Famine in the horn of Africa, why that's utterly passe darling. There's no future in it. We did it to death a few seasons ago."

In its function as a vehicle to sell advertising, and hence as entertainment, the international information media is apparently devoid of any sense of moral responsibility to keep attention focused on suffering whether it bores people or not. The fact that they serve a corporate economic as well as a national interest cuts no ice. Again, those outside the walls of the feudal global village have no access to the protection of power.

In the United States in particular, the outside world is seen not as a place of flesh and blood reality but as a kind of stage upon which the various TV dramas of The News are set. It is the infant who has yet to understand that there are alternate centers of self and sees everything Other as a screen on which to project its own fantasies, dreams and nightmares. This is as true of the do good left as the imperialist right.

The bottom line is that the murderous gaze of the camera can not be avoided. When areas of the Third World become, through human or natural malevolence, abattoirs of humanity, the power of life and death, to some extent, resides in the media. But the international information monopoly of the North is incapable of a true sense of responsibility and regularly abuses its power.

This is why the New World Information Order is a necessity, and by God we shall have it.

Don't stop fighting for education

As the semester winds down and many of us are hunched over our desks writing papers and studying for exams, in Boston our legislators and governor are hunched as well, trying to figure out just how much they can get away with slicing from the higher education budget.

Like everyone else, I'm extremely busy right now, but this is no time to stop paying close attention to the news coming out of the statehouse. We are leaving campus in two weeks and the legislature knows it. Any pressure we can bring as a student body must be brought now.

The Board of Regents of Higher Education has begun to make noises that suggest they may be backing away from a huge tuition increase for next year; even so, a short note to them to remind them of the consequences of another increase may ensure that they not only make the right noises while we're here, but that they do the right thing after we've left. Tell them now.

On your next study break, take a minute to call your representative and senator and let them know that you're watching and that you are not doing all of this work in order to get good grades at an institution that's been discredited. When you apply for a job or to a graduate school, you don't want the interviewer to say, "Nice transcript — UMass at Amherst — aren't they grazing cattle there now?"

Finally, take the time in early summer to write a short letter to the editor of your hometown newspaper telling the people in your community what is happening to your University and to the vitality of their state. It means more to them when it is a story of somebody they know and not another sad graph on the six o'clock news. Already our tuition and fees are among the highest in the country for public institutions. The next round of increases will secure our place as a state that doesn't care if the vast majority of its young people have no options but to leave the state or take a job bagging groceries and live above the garage.

The problem won't go away when we go away. The price of democracy is eternal vigilance, and the price of public higher education is going up again if we don't let our voice be heard in the next few weeks.

Who gets too much exposure?

Today I went down to the Campus Center Store to purchase Mother's Day Cards. In the brief walk I passed no less than five heterosexual couples engaged in public displays of affection. I passed no same-sex couples.

At the store, I found that most of the greeting cards from "Both of us" had pictures on the front of cute little animals or cartoon characters paired off in heterosexual couples. I was unable to find any with pictures of same-sex couples.

The Fall 1991 Course Selection Catalog has a heterosexual couple on the cover with their arms around each other. I was unable to find any such University material with gay couples so prominently displayed.

In today's Collegian, there were nineteen news articles, plus assorted photos, editorials and advertisements (two of which featured pictures of heterosexual couples). There were two articles about gay isssues. In yesterday's Collegian none of the fourteen articles had anything to do with the LBG community.

I turned on my radio and for one hour kept track of the songs I heard on a popular radio station. Of the nine "love songs" I heard, seven were blatantly heterosexual and two could not be determined. None were explicitly about same-sex relationships.

Someone on my floor gave me an old copy of TV Guide. This particular issue, chosen at random, had as the cover feature a series of stories about prime time heterosexual couples and their babies. I picked a random night, Tuesday, and examined the prime time listings. Out of 26 entertainment programs (comedy, drama or mystery, not including movies) listed, there were eighteen shows I could positively identify that involved heterosexual couples. With the exception of L.A. Law, no shows with openly gay couples or characters, who were portrayed positively, could be identified.

And people have the nerve to complain that the gay community gets too much exposure?

Criticism of India Night unfair

On April 28, Indian students celebrated India Night with great enthusiasm. Some section of the student community claim that there was a significant amount of opposition to a play, "Bharatnama," which was staged as part of the cultural program. This claim is totally baseless.

We (Sridevi and Mahesh) were the cultural secretaries who were responsible for staging the cultural program. The entire show was a big success. It was presented under one common theme, "The Celebration of Indian Culture." It was attended by roughly 500 people. Everyone praised the show. As cultural secretaries, it was our responsibility to make sure that each and every item of the cultural show was a big success and we tried our best to achieve that goal. Once we heard the theme of the play from the writer (Rabi Dutta), both of us supported it instantly. One of us even acted in the play. If there were certain aspects of the play which we were strongly against, it was because we thought they were inappropriate for a cultural show. Differences of opinion and constructive criticisms cannot be labeled as "opposition." Nor can they be used in any way to slander an entire community as mediocre.

A lot of effort goes in organizing any function. India Night was no exception. Numerous problems are faced with different people having different opinions. Everyone involved in organizing the function was elated when the function was a big success. It is disheartening that some people remember the show for the problems that were faced rather than the success that was achieved.

Vote to support education May 14

On Tuesday, students registered to vote in Amherst have an opportunity to vote for education. The town election on the proposed override of Proposition 2½ will take place then, and the principal items on the ballot concern town support for education. If voters in Amherst do not vote to support education, that will be a powerful message sent to the governor and the legislature and will undermine campus efforts to save our University. If the override passes, the cost to most homeowners in Amherst will be under $250 for the year. If it fails, the cost to the campus may be enormous. How can we ask the politicians to support public education when the voters in Amherst are unwilling to do so?

Puerto Ricans need solidarity

The majority of Puerto Ricans are confused, afraid and apolitical. While the assimilators, or the pro-state "hood" regime, advocates both selling our culture, as well as to have an equal chance to fight against the world on behalf of the U.S. Perhaps an equal amount of Puerto Ricans, the coward, back-boneless colonialists, prefer to maintain the option of being Hispanic whenever it is convenient. On the other hand, the Puerto Ricans who advocate their heritage, culture and identity as an independent nation, are generally persecuted, silenced, censored, condemned and labled as radicals and communists, and are subjected to other means of tyrannical harassment. Moreover, besides being a welfare dependent territory (936 bills, Jones Act, etc.), a military recruitment barrel, sharing a stolen citizenship, and promoting the assimilation of foreign values and goals, the majority of Puerto Ricans are giving up.

Furthermore, while many pseudo-Hispanic Americans on campus are progressively adopting "Spanglish" as their new language encouraged by the imperialists, others are arguing which country has better diction or which country is the most representative of a "collective reality." This confusion is supplemented by a servile interpretation of history. While Latin Americans in general, attempting to seek a new "mother land" as an attempt to rebel against their current oppressor, have a tendency to return to the "Spanish heritage." Apparently, these individuals are sympathetic with slavery, exploitation, colonization and manipulation, among other barbarous types of behavior, which was typical of the Spanish "Conquistador" and even our "Christian saviors."

Some of these mentalities are further reflected and promoted on campus by our organizations. The Bilingual Collegiate Program, for instance, claims to be representative of the Latin American culture, yet how many Brazilian, or for that matter South and Central Americans work in this organization? Which in turn is complimented by the transformation of values of the Puerto Rican majority, which is generally more interested in seeking a good education as a means of making more money, eating good food and partying in their free time. The Puerto Rican people need to seek a political identity. It is time we start educating ourselves instead of enslaving our own people. The Hispanic American people need to continue showing solidarity and support, and actually help the Colonial and State "hooders" back off their "welfare trip." By contrast the Puerto Ricans need to start recognizing and evaluating their current attitudes.

Namey represents Eugene Kim Schumann, one of the alleged victim's former boyfriends. Schumann gave a paid interview to the Globe which he now says portrayed him and the woman unfairly. He also was questioned by Kennedy family investigators who have been gathering information about the woman.

"Judges don't let these cases turn into a muckracking debacle," Namey said.

Florida law says "prior consentual sexual activity between the victim and any other person shall not be admitted" as evidence in rape trials.

"It's certainly intended to help woman feel safe, that whatever their past, they're not going to be put on trial. It's obviously designed to encourage the reporting of rape," said Brian Treny, chief prosecutor in the sexual crimes unit of neighboring Broward County.

An open letter to De La

"Yo Chuck, they must be on the pipe, right?"
— Public Enemy, "Don't Believe The Hype" Pos, Mase, Dove:

Commentary

I'm so embarrassed. Ya didn't make it to our little spring concert dealie. But that's not what I'm embarrassed about. I'm embarrassed because some redneck Connecticut cop was the reason you didn't make it and the powers that be at our little spring concert.

Maybe I'm more ticked off than your average schmoe because I was looking forward to a scheduled De La interview this afternoon, but there seems to be a big difference between mechanical difficulties and having your van strip searched by some badge-wearin', white-trash punk. (One wonders if Connecticut's Finest would have pursued such extreme measures to look for drugs if, say, the Amherst College Glee Club had been speeding down Highway 91.)

I dunno. I'm still gonna buy De La Soul Is Serving A Life Sentence when it comes out on Tuesday. But the next time the Connecticut Police Band is in town, I may have to Just Say No.

As your replacement act so appropriately put it, "Don't think twice, it's alright."

Straight up.

Wind."

Dylan played one song that was truly recognizable, "Knocking on Heaven's Door," but it's familiar because everyone and their mother has covered this tune. After "Knocking on Heaven's Door," the man spoke to the audience, "Please don't confuse that with grumble, frena, mummble."

What?

Someone, who was fluent in Dylanese, translated it to "Don't confuse that with 'Like a Rolling Stone.'"

Thank God for handy, die-hard Dylan fans.

He propmtly followed his cryptic utterance with a crunching version of "Like a Rolling Stone." On the whole, Dylan put on a good show, playing songs that were appropriate for a hot day when all you really want to do is lie in the sun and drink a cold beer.

Dylan finished off his set with "Maggie's Farm" from his 1965ish album, Bring It All Back Home. Everyone was happy, even Mr. Swan who was mellowed by Bob's soothing tunes.

But then — well it was just awful. It had been announced that De La Soul would not be appearing at all. According to Jodi Avery, the Union Program Council talent coordinator, De La Soul was not fated to grace the UMass campus yesterday. First, it was bus trouble which held them up in New Jersey until 2 p.m. They still wanted to play UMass and the UPC was able to convince Bob Dylan to go along with the resulting schedule change.

At about 4:15 p.m., as Dylan went on, they called to say that they were in New Haven and closing in on Amherst — all was good. But then about 20 minutes before the end of Dylan's set, another call came in from them to explain that they would not be able to make it on time because they were pulled over by Connecticut State Troopers who persisted in searching through every nook and cranny of their possessions.

Let us follow the example of David Lettermen and thank the Connecticut State Police for the fine job that they do in servicing the public.

Well, a dark cloud spread over the crowd as they skulked away, robbed of their soul. But Mr. Swan was glad to be rid of them.

Chris Isaak performance to benefit Center for the Arts

By NOA BEN-YEHUDA
Collegian Staff

All the brouhaha stirred up and around the moody crooner with a too cute nose, Chris Isaak, might have helped to propel your scanning eyes to this article. Hopefully the true quality of his performance will help propel you to John M. Green Hall at Smith College tonight and propel your hand into your wallet where money awaits to change hands.

Isaak will be performing to help raise money for the Northampton Center for the Arts. The concert was originally scheduled for Friday night but was rescheduled to allow him an appearance on Saturday Night Live.

Isaak took the opportunity on Saturday Night to do a skit between sets thus adding to his acting credits which include appearances in Married to the Mob and Silence of the Lambs.

He recorded the soundtracks for Lynch's Wild at Heart and some of Blue Velvet before really hitting the charts with his album Heart Shaped World. The ascension from San Fran boy with a look and a guitar to the "hottest ticket in rock 'n' roll" was abrupt. He still has that shell shocked air about him of a newcomer to the scene.

"Wicked Game," his latest hit was written late one night when Isaak was waiting for a woman to come over, he told Rolling Stone. "It was one of those things where you know you shouldn't, but you let 'em. By the time she got there, I had pretty much finished. . . We didn't do much guitar playing after she got there," Isaak said. The song is a good example of his dark ephemeral style and the story behind it a good example of his open easy style which has been compare to Elvis's.

Interested?

The benefit is just one of several concerts organized to help keep the doors of the Center for the Arts open and to "keep the wolf away," according to Steve Calcagnino of the Center. The Indigo Girls did their thing for the Center earlier this year with good results.

Calcagnino explained that arts organizations will increasingly have to turn to such means of fundraising if they hope to continue operating in the face of budget cuts. If the Center for the Arts was to shut their doors, events like First night and Arts in the Park would be cancelled.

The Center helps produce about 100 performances, like the wildly successful "Rhythm Visions," and 20 arts exhibitions like the Western Mass Illustrators Show, every year.

Local dancers, artists and musicians are emphasized. "Really it is an artist cooperative," said Calcagnino. "There is a large population of artists in the area and it is difficult for them to produce shows for lack of space."

The Iron Horse worked with The Center to produce and promote this concert. They hope to raise between $3,000-$7,000 depending on ticket sales. Their annual budget is close to $150,000.

Special "Front and Center" tickets at $25 are available at the Northampton Box office. Call 586-8686 or 1-800-THE-TICK for more information. With all of the great free entertainment provided by the Center for the Arts year-round, the donation can be considered a membership fee, or a gift, or a good price for a great concert.

The Iron Horse and WRSI 95.3 FM will present Chris Isaak at John M. Greene Hall tonight at 8 p.m. Proceeds will benefit the Northampton Center for the Arts.

-ters in a row. He had three strikouts and two walks for the game.

Rutgers scored in the first when Angel Echevaria singled with two outs and Jason Imperial drove him in with a double.

UMass got two runs in the third after Dave Edwards led off with a single and Steve Corradi walked and with two outs. Both Brian Bright and Derek Dana hit RBI singles to give UMass the lead.

"We didn't let down after the first game," Stone said, citing the 2-1 lead in the seventh inning.

The middle innings were rough for UMass pitchers, especially reliever Rob Graziano who hit two batters but escaped unscathed.

Ron Villone, the stopper of the staff, came in with one out in the bottom of the sixth. In the seventh Villone gave up a double to Mike Higgins and an RBI double to James Cann who lined it just past first baseman Ian Torres.

The critical stage of the game occurred when Rich Graham came into the game — runners were on second and third with no outs. Graham walked the first batter to load the bases and Mike Winchock hit a two-run double followed by another two-run double by Chris Gurkin to blow the game open at 6-2.

John Russell relieved Graham but Rutgers' suicide squeezed the seventh run in and Imperial hit an RBI single to up the score 8-2.

Stone said he thought the sacrifice squeeze play was a good idea.

The source of controversy throughout the game was Rutgers questionable practice of dipping into the pitched ball and then receiving first base.

"I thought it was illegal to lean in and went out there to argue, but the ump said the batter wasn't leaning in," Stone said.

Dana led off with a single at the top of ninth and Glenn DiSarcina hit a grounder to third and reached on a fielder's choice. Carelli singled and Howard hit a routine ball to second that went though the legs of Rutgers' second baseman Chris McAlinden and DiSarcina scored to complete the score at 8-3.

Game 6: Rutgers 4, Massachusetts 5

For the third time in three A-10 playoff games, UMass fell behind early — this time, 4-0 in the championship game against Rutgers.

But the Minutemen came back to tie the score in the seventh, and nearly tied it again in the 10th when John Carelli was thrown out at home on a game-ending play that forced a second championship game.

In one of the truly clutch performances of the year, infielder Torres crushed a Dave Hornaday pitch in the seventh inning to tie the score at 4-4. Torres, a left-handed batter, had trouble in the Penn State game against lefty Chris Cisar. But Torres was seen in batting practice crushing the ball, and he hit Hornaday's pitch like it was a batting practice mellon.

UMass rallied again in the eighth, but they couldn't break through against Hornaday or reliever Jim Kohl. UMass' Justin Howard was left stranded at third after singling, as Rutgers' Echevaria made a game-saving catch of Mike Tobin's fly ball to the right field warning track.

A ninth-inning rally by UMass was also killed.

The Minutemen fell behind in the 10th when Rutgers' Jay Marchese was hit by a Jeff Toothaker pitch, stole second and scored on Mike Winchock's RBI single. Villone finished the inning for the heroic Toothaker after Toothaker hit Higgins with another pitch. Villone struck out Doug Meiner to end the inning.

In the bottom of the 10th, Carelli led off with a single and was sacrificed to second. With two outs and two strikes, Tobin hit a routine groundball that shortstop Winchock threw high. Carelli rounded third on the play and tried to slide under Higgins, but Carelli was called out on a close play that could have been called either way, but forced the two teams into a third and final meeting for the A-10 title.

Left-hander Scott Meaney just did't have his stuff in Sunday's first game as he hit two batters, walked one and was hindered by two defensive errors. He didn't make it out of the first inning.

Doug Alongi led off the game by getting plunked by a Meaney pitch, and went to second when Meaney's pickoff attempt bounced off first baseman Torres' glove. McAlinden then laid down a sacrifice bunt that was thrown away by Meaney, putting runners on first and third with no outs.

Echevaria drove in the first run with an RBI single. Imperial followed, advancing Echevaria and McAlinden to second and third, respectively. Marchese then grounded to Carelli at second, who tried to nail McAlinden at the plate. McAlinden was safe, and Rutgers led 2-0. Marchese scored the third run of the inning when Winchock walked with the bases loaded.

In the second, McAlinden hit a solo home run off Toothaker, Meaney's replacement, and things looked bleak for UMass.

As they have done all year, however, the Minutemen battled back in the second, scoring two runs. Bright, leading off, reached on a Winchock error and moved to second when Dana walked. A passed ball advanced both runners, and with Rutgers' infield playing back, Carelli and DiSarcina hit RBI groundouts to shortstop, halving the Rutgers lead.

UMass picked away for one more in the bottom of the fifth on back-to-back doubles by Torres and Corradi. UMass tried to rally for more, but Scarlet Knight starter Hornaday struck out DiSarcina with runners on second and third to end the threat.

Meanwhile, Toothaker pitched on guts, getting three double plays and exceptional play from DiSarcina at short and Corradi at third. Corradi took Torres' spot at third because Torres was at first in place of Jay Dodig, who suffered a separated shoulder in Saturday's game against Rutgers.

Game 4: Massachusetts 11, Rutgers 6

The Scarlet Knights beat George Washington 4-2 and had not lost in 14 games, but it didn't matter to UMass.

After giving up three runs in the first inning, highlighted by an Imperial two-run home run, starter Jim Telgheder settled down and allowed only two more runs in 7⅓ innings.

"Once I settled down and got the through the first couple of innings, everything started going all right," explained Telgheder. "Everyone started swinging the bats real well."

Swinging well is an understatement. UMass garnered 15 hits, including four by second baseman/designated hitter Carelli, and never trailed after scoring four runs in the bottom of the first to erase the Rutgers lead.

Dana and DiSarcina each got two hits in their first two at-bats, driving in five of UMass' first seven runs. DiSarcina's third-inning single drove starting pitcher Dave Hoelher from the game.

UMass scored two more runs in the middle innings on Mike Tobin's homer and Bright's opposite-field shot in the fifth — his second of the Tournament.

The Minutemen lost first baseman Dodig to an injury when he attempted to add an insurance run in the eighth. Carelli led off with a double and scored when Dodig greeted reliever Steve DePolo with an RBI single, upping the UMass lead to 10-5.

Dodig was subsequently sent home on a Tobin double, but was out by 10 feet at home. He tried to barrel into Rutgers catcher Mike Higgins — a human fire hydrant — and separated his left shoulder, tearing ligaments in the process. He will miss the rest of the season.

"I shouldn't have sent him [home]," said Stone regretfully. "I was too greedy for runs with that big of a lead."

Corradi's hitting was outstanding, as he was the catalyst of UMass rallies in the first and third innings with three hits.

Villone, in relief of Telgheder, pitched out of jams in the last two innings. "Telgheder didn't have his stuff, but he battled," Stone said. "It was much the same as Graham's effort [against Penn State]."

Villone induced Higgins into a double play in the eighth then, after giving up a homer to Steve Michaels in the ninth, struck out the side to record his fifth save on the year.

"After I gave up the home run, I felt better because I wasn't getting the ball over in the beginning," Villone said. "But then I put a ball over — except he [Michaels] hit it."

UMass laid to rest the ugly memory of last year's loss against Rutgers, which occurred in the same round of last year's tournament. UMass led going into the ninth inning in that game, but then-stopper Gerry Creamer blew the save opportunity as Rutgers scored three runs. Rutgers won in 14 innings, 8-7.

Asked if he brought up last year's loss to Rutgers, Stone replied, "Absolutely not."

"This is a new team, a new ball club," he said. "We're a better ball club."

Game 1: Massachusetts 4, Penn State 3

UMass played a hot Penn State squad that had won 15 of their last 18 games. Graham matched against PSU's Chris Cisar, who proved to be as good as his press clippings suggested.

UMass, behind 2-0 to Penn State when Graham surrendered a two-run homer to right fielder Dave Hall. Graham settled down after that, pitching spectacularly the rest of the way. He allowed only one more run in the third — Russ Mushinsky's RBI single.

UMass mounted their first attack in the top of the fifth, when DiSarcina and Corradi drew back-to-back lead-off walks. Howard sacrificed them into scoring position and Dodig and Tobin drove them in, cutting the lead to 3-2.

Controversy arose in the top of the sixth after Torres led off with a single. Stone had Bright sacrifice when a round-tripper would have given UMass the lead. Bright bunted successfully, however and Dana singled Bright to second and Torres to third. DiSarcina lofted a sacrifice fly that Torres appeared to score on, but Penn State appealed the the call, and the third base umpire ruled that Torres left too soon.

Bright, more than a little upset at being left off the A-10 Conference All-Star Team, stepped up against reliever Dean Kerns on his next at-bat and nailed the ball over the left field fence to tie the score at 3-3.

The Minutemen took the lead in the top of the ninth when Carelli drew his fourth walk of the game. Howard's sacrifice bunt was thrown away by PSU closer Gary Miller, and Carelli scored all the way from first on the error, giving UMass the 4-3 lead.

Graham pitched a complete game, striking out nine hitters with his nasty slider and walking one.

"I didn't have a particularly good fastball or curve, but I got every one of my strikeouts with my slider, and Derek called a great game," Graham said.

Graham pitched on guts alone the last two innings, especially the bottom of the ninth. "My arm was killing me," said Graham. "But if you can't suck it up, you don't belong here."

runners at the corners, she bore down to record her fifth strikeout and end the rally.

Massachusetts extended their lead in the third as they struck for two runs. Rachel Lawson roped a double to left and was pinch run by Heather Dorsey. Duest, an A-10 Tournament All-Star, slapped a single to right moving Dorsey to third. Captain Chris Collins pinch hit for Claffey and hit a grounder to third baseman Carla Camino who threw to second, forcing Duest out.

DellAnno, also an A-10 All-Tourney selection, delivered a single to left, driving in Dorsey. Jen Miller drew a walk to load the bases and Kuchinskas drew another walk to force the run.

Kuchinskas, who was named the Tournamen MVP, went 5-10 on the weekend, driving three runs (two game-winners) and scoring two runs with one home run. She entered the tourney batting .336 on the season.

"Sheri is a quality, quality player," Sortino said. "She is on a roll right now and her play behind the plate is allowing us to leave DellAnno and her good speed in right field. I thought she should have been an A-0 All-Star at the utility position."

Although Claffey gave up more runs (four, three earned) than she has since spring break, she did pitch a strong game. Claffey, who was named Most Valuable Pitcher of the tournament, struckout six Scarlet Knights.

Rutgers started to get back into the game in the fourth. Nikki Ambruso singled sharply to center and got by Aprile allowing Ambruso to advance to third. Jody Miller blooped a single to right and Ambroso scored the unearned run.

In the fifth, Rutgers banged home three runs on three hits. They loaded the bases with none out. Claffey got TJ Vanblargan to pop up to Schilling at first. McMahon, who was batting .347 with two homers and 24 RBI, drilled a base-clearing triple to center and put Rutgers back in the game.

Claffey settled down and returned to form the rest of the way as she retired the last eight Scarlet Knights she faced to preserve the win.

"I was pleased with my performance except for the [McMahon] at bat," She said. "I pitched better today than I did on Friday [3-2 win over Temple]."

Game 3: Massachusetts 3, Rutgers2

In the semis UMass threw Aprile at Rutgers and she delivered both the pitches and hits that UMass needed to beat Rutgers 3-2.

Massachusetts got the game winner in the fifth from Collins. Schilling led off with a double down the third baseline, pinch run by Dorsey, who moved to third on a Duest sacrifice. Collins came off the bench to bat for Amy Cockley and singled to center for the RBI.

Darlene Claffey, who won her 20th game against Rutgers yesterday, pitched the Minutewomen out of some tight jams to clinch the Atlantic 10 Championship crown.

"I knew I needed a fly ball but I ended up getting a single," Collins said. "I was thinking a long fly ball but I didn't get a good piece of it; it just fell in for the hit."

Aprile pitched a strong game for UMass. She was somewhat wild as she walked three but allowed only six hits as she struck out six Scarlet Knights. The only runs she gave up were on balls that got by Kuchinskas.

"Holly kept us in it today," Sortino said. "She was throwing extremely hard and the walks don't bother me because batters tend to wait on her. She got the outs when they were necessary.

"Holly has been pitching as well as ever. Today we wouldn't have won without her. She lived up to being A-10 Player of the Year."

In the first, Kuchinskas roped a two-out double into left field. Aprile followed suit, stroking a pitch down the line to bring Kuchinskas in.

Taking a big leadoff, she drew McMahon to throw to second. Without hesitation, she broke for third as Kim Smykal overthrew third allowing Aprile to round the bags to score.

In the fourth Rutgers had a runner on second with none out but Aprile rose to the challenge, striking out the side to keep Rutgers scoreless.

"Holly just wanted to make it happen today," Sortino said. "And today she did what it took for us to win. That's a big time player who can do that in big games."

The Scarlet Knights got to the Aprile in the fifth. Fowler singled to left and was sacrificed to second. Camino hit a dying quail to shallow right to advance Fowler to third. Fowler scored on a passed ball.

In the sixth Rutgers was able to close the gap to 3-2, again on passed balls. Tammie Ward blooped a single to right and then stole second with Penny Rosario at the plate. Two Aprile pitches got by Kuchinskas and Ward was able to score. Rosario went on to strike out.

"Sheri said the fast ball was dipping and that she had trouble cathing it," Sortino said. "It was pretty ugly. It was a tough way to give up two runs."

"We played a much better game today than in Game 1," she said. "We were much looser and you're not going to blow away these teams in the A-10 Tournament. Everything is going to be a struggle and today was no exception."

"They know they were in a game today," Rutgers coach Pat Willis said. "We just were not on the top of our game. Against a team like UMass you have to play sharp and capitalize on the opportunities you receive. Today we didn't."

Game 1: Massachusetts 3, Temple 2

The Minutewomen came out extremely tense and tight and subsequently had to go eight innings to beat the Owls 3-2.

In the eighth Kuchinskas hit a looping fly to left field. It was misplayed Steph Ritter who overran the play. The ball bounced to the fence, giving Kuchinskas the opportunity to score. It was ruled a home run and Kuchinskas got the winning RBI.

"It was not your normal game-winning homer, but, hey, it got the job done," Sotino said. "A win's a win and no one will remember how ugly it was on Monday."

UMass started off fast as DellAnno led off the first inning with a triple. Kuchinskas knocked her in with a single to left.

Temple touched Claffey in the third by loading the bases with one out. Denise Sarno singled to left to drive in the run.

Claffey pitched a solid but not spectacular game. She struck out two and walked one on the way to her 20th win of the season. Only one of her runs were earned as she suffered from poor defense by teammates (four errors).

"Her teammates didn't make it easy for Darlene," Sortino said. "She pitched a strong game overall. I am pleased."

In the Massachusetts fourth, Duest singled up the middle to bring in Bush from third. The Owls tied the game in the sixth as UMass took a defensive page from the Bad News Bears.

With Sarno on first, Angel Prinos laid down a bunt and Schilling overthrew first, advancing the runners to second and third. Sue Lesher flied to Aprile to double up Sarno on third. The ball was overthrown and four Minutewomen collided, scrambling for the ball as Sarno scored, setting the stage for Kuchinskas' somewhat dramatic home run.

Prop 2½ override vote to be held today

By ALEX DERING
Collegian Staff

The vote to override Proposition 2½ in Amherst will be held today from noon to 8 p.m.

Although the ballot consists of seven questions, only the last two are related to public education. Those two questions are "tiered," which means voters may choose between two different monetary levels on each of those questions.

Question 6 provides for an increase of either $300,000 or $400,000 for funding the Amherst Elementary Schools. Question 7 asks for a similar increase for the purpose of paying either $300,000 or $550,000 for Amherst's portion of the operating and capital costs of the Amherst-Pelham Regional School District.

The money would come from increases in real estate and personal property taxes.

Sheldon Goldman, a professor in the University of Massachusetts political science department, said if Questions 6 and 7 do not pass, it will reflect badly at the state government level on the issue of public higher education.

"Gov. Weld and the legislators will be watching to see how strong the commitment to education is in Amherst," he said. "If the people here vote down the override, those legislators will start asking why they should support public higher education when Amherst residents won't even pay a relatively small increase in property taxes to ensure better public education."

Bob Gage, co-coordinator of Concerned Citizens for Amherst, estimated the increase would be $155 in current property tax rates.

Proposition 2 1/2, passed in 1980, was intended to reduce real estate, personal property and motor vehicle excise taxes. It also set 4 percent as the limit on how much a city or town could increase its taxes each year.

The Boston division of Citizens for Limited Taxation, which worked to establish Proposition 2 1/2, works only to protect it as a law, according to Pat Warnock, at the CLT office.

"We never advise pro or con on an override vote. The people who live in the town or city know best whether to override [Proposition 2 1/2]," Warnock said.

Precinct One may vote at the North Congressional Church located at North Pleasant Street.

Precinct Two, which includes Central living area, may vote at the North Fire Station located at East Pleasant Street.

Precinct Three, which includes Northeast and Sylvan living areas, may vote at the Emmanuel Lutheran Church Lounge, at 867 North Pleasant Street.

Precincts Four, Five and 10, which includes all Southwest residents, may vote at the Bangs Community Center on Kellogg Avenue.

Precinct Six may vote at the Fort River School on South East Street.

Precinct Seven may vote at the Crocker Farms School on West Street.

Precinct Eight may vote at the Munson Memorial Library on South East Street.

Precinct Nine, which includes Central living area except Van Meter dormitory, may vote at Wildwood School on Strong Street.

Senator keynote speaker at graduation

Student Address to be given by engineering student, Aaron Rome

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

United States Sen. Barbara Mikulski (D-Maryland) will be the keynote speaker at the 121st Commencement of the University of Massachusetts Sunday, May 26, at 10:30 a.m. in McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

Mikulski has represented Maryland in the U.S. Senate since 1987. She is the first woman to win a statewide election in Maryland; she is the first Democratic woman to ever hold a Senate seat not previously held by her husband; and she is the first Democratic woman to have served in both houses of Congress.

Mikulski chairs the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on the Veterans Administration, the Department of Housing and Urban Development and Independent Agencies.

Mikulski coordinates one of the federal government's largest spending bills, including funds for the National Science Foundation, NASA, the Environmental Protection Agency and more than a dozen other agencies.

The Student Commencement Address will be given by Aaron Rome, a civil engineering student who will receive his bachelor of science degree.

Since enrolling at the University in 1987, Rome has challenged himself by competing in several marathons and triathalons. However, he considers his most valuable and rewarding challenge to be his experience at MassPIRG, the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group.

Through MassPIRG, Rome coordinated campus events, including Earth Day 1990 and the UMass Voter Campaign, which registered 2,200 student voters for the 1990 election.

In July, if accepted, Rome plans to join the Peace Corps, a long-time ambition. His placement will likely be in West Africa where he will apply his knowledge as a graduating civil engineer to work on water and sanitation projects.

President-Chancellor Joseph Duffey will be presiding over his last commencement before he leaves to become president of American University in Washington, D.C.

An honorary Doctor of Laws degree will be awarded to Mikulski. Honorary Doctor of Humane Letters degrees will be awarded to Duffey, the Rev. J. Joseph Quigley, director of the Catholic Newman Center at the University, and Edwin D. Driver, professor emeritus and co-founder of the department of sociology at the University.

Honorary Doctor of Science degrees will be awarded to Walter E. Massey, director of the National Science Foundation, and George Richason, Jr., University alumnus and professor of chemistry. An honorary Doctor of Engineering degree will be awarded to Nicholas Boraski, University alumnus and a former vice president of General Electric and now president of Boraski Consultants.

Cape Verdean ambassador speaks on importance of education

By HEIDI McCANN
Collegian Correspondent

Jose Luis de Jesus, Cape Verde's ambassador to the United Nations and the keynote speaker at Saturday's Cape Verdean Awareness Day Conference, called for a dual solution to his country's problems, many of which were illuminated in the day's events.

De Jesus said that Cape Verdeans both native and abroad must begin to make education a priority and increase investments from the country's population, two-thirds of which live away from the homeland.

"It is hard to be a small country because it is difficult to put forward issues. But it is not size that should define justice. Rather it is in the mind, professional seriousness and moral standing," de Jesus said.

The conference marked the final day of a week of events held to heighten awareness of the Cape Verdean nation and its issues.

Other events held during the week included a movie Tuesday night, and discussions Wednesday and Friday on issues such as the University of Massachusetts' perception of Cape Verdeans, and Cape Verdeans as professionals in the work field.

Saturday's conference held in the Campus Center opened with a welcoming from Jo-Anne Vanin, interim vice chancellor for student affairs, who said she hoped that the week's events would motivate students to turn their awareness into action.

"Don't just be different, make a difference," said Vanin, who wished the students to be "enlightened, educated and entertained by lectures, songs and experiences uniquely Cape Verdean."

Malkes Gomes of the Cape Verdean Student Alliance also spoke at the commencement of the day's events and said that "unity must be promoted."

Following the welcoming, workshops were held on issues such as "How to Become an Elected Official in Municipal Government" and "The Islands of Cape Verde: Origin of the Cape Verdean People and the Diocese of Santiago."

At one workshop held by Francisco Fernandes, emigration deputy for Cape Verdeans in America, the drastic changes which occurred following Cape Verde's independence in 1975 were discussed at length.

Cape Verde, a small country of approximately 1.2 million people, was until 1975 a colony of Portugal, and suffered greatly from this colonial control, according to Fernandes.

For example, under Portuguese control, Cape Verde suffered from 80 percent unemployment. Unemployment dropped to 20 percent following the installment of the new independent government, dominated by the Partido Africano Para a Independencia de Cabo Verde, Fernandes said.

After workshops were completed, a lengthy introduction was delivered for de Jesus, who has earned a Law degree from the University of Portugal, held a position in the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization and served as Chairman of the International Tribune of the Law of the Sea.

Since February, de Jesus has headed the Cape Verde Mission to the United Nations. As Ambassador, de Jesus defends both the Cape Verdean and African position in international politics.

Such politics include the Law of the Sea. Only 4000 square kilometers of the country are dry land, and the remaining 800,000 kilometers are on the ocean.

In 1982, fishing and extraction of other natural resources was deemed illegal, de Jesus said.

Such wealths as the sea bed are precious to Cape Verdeans because of their country's lack of other natural resources.

This lack of natural resources is a fundamental impediment to the country's development as a Third World country, de Jesus said. Also, a nationwide drought condition and the country's tendency to export its people as migrant workers have slowed development.

Despite these problems, de Jesus said that "the new generation of Cape Verdean has a commitment to the developing nation of Cape Verde, and many have gotten an education abroad, to come back and change society in a positive way."

These students "have a vision, to make Cape Verde a developed nation." Such schooling de Jesus said is "paramount."

"Cape Verdeans must make a massive investment in education, and it must become a major concern of the current government as a tool for the Cape Verdean community, both at home and abroad."

In his two part-agenda for the amelioration of Cape Verde's Third World condition, de Jesus also said that Cape Verde's best natural resources are human resources, and "education is a tool for promoting such natural resources in Cape Verde and abroad.

"We must take advantage of this. . .it is the only resource that we can count on."

British, Iraqi troops trade gunfire

QAKHO, Iraq (AP) — As allied forces tried to persuade more Kurds to return hone to northern Iraq yesterday, British and Iraqi soldiers exchanged gunfire at a summer palace of Saddam Hussein's in the area, British military officials said.

No British casualties were reported, and there was no word of Iraqi casualties in the shootout near the northern city of Sirsenk, well within the allied "safe haven" zone intended to protect the Kurdish refugees.

The British officials said the incident involved a British patrol and several Iraqi soldiers inside the palace complex, which is surrounded by 12-foot walls. It is five miles east of Sirsenk airfield, where the British marines have their headquarters.

Also yesterday, Secretary of State James a Baker III asked the Soviet Union for support in authorizing a U.N. police force to replace American and other allied troops protecting Kurdish refugees in northern Iraq.

But Soviet Foreign Minister Alexander A. Bessmertnyk, who met with Baker in Cairo yesterday, did not say publicly whether Baker had persuaded him to back an expected U.S.-backed resolution in the Security Council. Iraq rejected a previous U.N. effort to establish a police force in northern Iraq.

The shootout was reported by the British Defense Ministry and confirmed by the British Embassy in Ankara, Turkey.

The first Iraqi gunfire at the Royal Marines patrol took place at about 10:30 a.m. local time, when three rounds were fired from the palace complex in front of a patrol, said James Gee, a spokesman for the British Defense Ministry at Silopi, Turkey.

At 1:13 p.m., one round was fired at the standing patrol from the same area, and it was answered by one round, Gee said.

At 1:20 p.m., two men emerged from a block house on the palace wall and began to fire long bursts of automatic fire at the patrol. Fire was returned and the two men dropped from sight, he said.

UM cheerleader hits the big time

Student snags spot on Patriots' cheering squad

By MEREDITH O'BRIEN
Collegian Staff

While many graduating seniors are still frantically looking for jobs in a scarce market, at least one senior has found a job she can cheer about.

Earlier this month, former University of Massachusetts cheerleader Emily Bixler surpassed hundreds of competitors and snagged a spot on the newly revived New England Patriots' cheerleading squad. Bixler, a graduating sports management major, was selected from a field of 226 women.

A UMass cheerleader from 1988-1990, Bixler said she was unable to cheer this year because she was doing an internship at a Norfolk, Virginia civic arena coordinating promotions.

While Bixler, a high school cheerleader and former instructor for the Universal Cheerleaders Association, said she might have had a fleeting thought or two about becoming a professional cheerleader, she never expected it to become a reality.

"I thought after last year's last basketball game it was all over for me," she said. "I've always thought about [cheering professionally] in the back of my mind."

Bixler, who said she has always had a love for cheering and dancing, said she jumped at the shot at a professional cheering slot, but never expected to make it.

The competition for the 20 slots was fierce, she said. "As soon as I got in there I thought, 'Oh God, I don't know if I can do this.' Most of the girls were professional dancers," Bixler said.

After making three cuts during the 10-hour tryout, Bixler said the 20 new members were announced.

"My mother is just on cloud nine, telling the entire town," she said. "I never realized what a big deal this was until a few days later."

With long-term goals of running the promotional campaigns of professional teams, Bixler said she wants to be involved with the Patriots' squad and be a part of the promotional aspect of the team. "I don't want to be stereotyped into the image of a blonde bouncing around on the field," she said.

Bixler said she will still have to find a full-time job because the squad only works on weekends. "But if I had it my way, I'd just do this as a career," she said.

As a Patriots cheerleader, she said there will be a lot to adjust to. "In college, cheerleading is definitely a sport, with a lot of stunts and gymnastics," she said. "But with the Patriots we will be more of a showgirl type. There's a lot more dancing involved."

Aside from cheering on the weekends, Bixler said she will join her teammates in helping promote the team at charity functions as well as pose for posters and endorsements for the team.

Supreme Court rules on validity of arrests without warrants

WASHINGTON (AP) — People arrested by police without warrants generally must receive a court hearing within 48 hours to determine the arrest's validity, the Supreme Court ruled by a 5-4 vote yesterday.

The court's four dissenters said waiting 48 hours is too long, and that such a hearing should be required immediately after an arrested individual is booked.

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, writing for the majority said a 48-hour period was deemed "constitutionally permissible."

Justice Antonin Scalia, considered the court's most conservative member, was one of the four dissenters.

"Hereafter, a law-abiding citizen wrongfully arrested may be compelled to wait the grace of a Dickensian bureaucratic machine as it churns its cycle for up to two days, never once given the opportunity to show a judge there is absolutely no reason to hold him, that a mistake has been made," Scalia wrote.

The court in 1975 ruled that people arrested without warrants are entitled to "prompt" hearings to determine whether the constitutionally required probable cause existed for the arrest.

But the court never before had said exactly what it meant by "prompt."

Writing for the court yesterday, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor said such hearings generally must be provided within 48 hours.

If more than 48 hours pass before a hearing is granted she said, "the burden shifts to the government to demonstrate the existence of a bona fide emergency or other extraordinary circumstance."

O'Connor was joined by Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and Justices Byron R. White, Anthony M. Kennedy and David H. Souter.

Joining Scalia in dissent were the court's three most liberal justices: Thurgood Marshall, Harry A. Blackmun and John Paul Stevens.

The Supreme Court also:

- Ruled that workers may be barred from suing their bosses for alleged age bias if the employees previously agreed to submit such claims to binding arbitration.

Some interest groups had told the court such a decision could affect millions of workers. But the court said yesterday it was deciding a relatively narrow issue that directly affects the securities industry.

By a 7-2 vote, the justices blocked a federal lawsuit by Robert Gilmer of Charlotte, N.C., who was fired at age 62 by a securities firm and replaced by a 28-year-old woman he helped train.

Justice Byron R. White, writing for the court, said the federal Age Discrimination in Employment Act does not foreclose the enforcement of agreements to arbitrate age bias claims.

- Agreed to review a ruling the Bush administration says could lead to a flood of young men seeking asylum in the United States form war-torn countries.

The justices said they will hear arguments that a federal appeals court is using too lenient a standard for determining which aliens are eligible for asylum under the Refugee Act of 1980.

- Agreed to consider letting federal agencies ignore the impact on endangered species when they support projects in foreign countries.

The court said it will hear a Bush administration appeal to overturn a victory for wildlife groups that want to protect endangered animals outside U.S. borders.

- Agreed to review two Alabama disputes centered on the rights of black voters in Etowah and Russell counties.

The justices said they will decide whether federal approval must be obtained for an Etowah County resolution adopted in 1987, that allocated among the county's six commissioners spending authority over bridge and road construction and repair.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

A 'radical commie' has the last word

When I became a columnist in October 1988, I never imagined the responses I would get to my writing. Of course, I expected people to take issue with some points and topics I raised, but I never thought readers would form their own opinions about me just on the narrow basis of what I wrote in my columns.

I was very naive.

Most of my columns have dealt with issues concerning sexism, abortion, discrimination and exploitation. I have repeatedly asserted that women are not sex objects and should be treated equally with men. As a result, I have been labeled a man-hater, with a "blatantly anti-White male slant."

Some people, who consider me radical, have the image that I lurk behind bushes on campus, waiting for someone to make a sexist comment so I can leap out of the shadows and castrate them. (Funny thing though, after my columns run, my White male friends don't grab their crotches to protect themselves when I walk by.)

My friends have said people who don't know me commonly ask them why I "hate" men. The other question they say people then ask is, "What does she look like?"

After I wrote a column criticizing the conduct of a woman at the Midnight Madness event as sexually exploitative, someone asked one of our reporters, "What's the deal with this Meredith O'Brien dame? And what does she look like?" A few days later, the subject of the same column told a Collegian staff member that I only criticized her because I was jealous of her looks.

You see, many people think that women who wear make-up, jewelry and skirts could never hold such "radically feminist" viewpoints. Apparently, most people assume that my looks would provide them with an explanation for why I supposedly hate men and write nasty things about them.

Meredith O'Brien

But when I do meet these people the first thing they say is, "You don't look like I thought you would." I never realized that in order to advocate equal and fair treatment of women, I had to look a certain way. I suppose it is easier for people to dismiss my columns that challenge the status quo by saying, "She must be a hairy monster," than try to understand what I am saying.

But aside from the comments about my looks and my concepts about men, there are other readers who have drawn other conclusions about me:

Last semester, when I served as editor in chief, a paranoid UMass English professor wrote in to criticize me for "using my political opinions" expressed in my columns to indoctrinate all of the staff writers and taint all of the news.

Being a West Springfield native who was sick of Eastern Massachusetts residents dumping on Western Mass., I once wrote a column satirizing their attitudes. In response, one reader wrote, "Has she ventured south of Amherst, to pastures such as Holyoke, Chicopee or West Springfield, where evidence of cows are found in quart-sized cartons?"

Malignly selfish and ignorant, uneducated, cream puff, homophobic, racist, anti-Semitic and communist — these adjectives about sum up the rest of the responses I've received in my three years here at the Collegian. Because of these responses, I can now consider myself a fuller and better person.

But, before I leave, there's one thing that I've been dying to say that would immediately confuse all of you who think that you can accurately form an opinion of me or my life — I, the radical man-hating feminist, was a high school cheerleader.

Meredith O'Brien is, for the last time, a Collegian columnist

Don't force University to close

I write this letter in response to the Massachusetts Society of Professors (MSP) and their plan of attack against the budget cuts. First of all, I would like to thank you for your long-standing and vigorous support of public higher education in Massachusetts. I would also like to commend you on your opposition to the furlough program and accompanying strike, as it should be demanded of no one to work for nothing. However, I disagree with your latest strategy to bring financial support to the University.

The plan entails making a deal with the administration not to fire any employees, but to continue doing business as if nothing were wrong. Eventually, the University would go bankrupt and close for what could be the entire spring semester (or even longer). The thrust of the plan is to shock students and citizens into action to save their state universities from the budget axe. While the thinking behind this action is good-natured, I as a student find it not only condescending, but against everyone's interests.

It is true that it is difficult to mobilize students to support anything, even if it is in our own interests. But this attempt to sharpen the blow of the budget cuts is a manipulation to stimulate the students into action. We do not want to be dragged into Boston on the end of a rope — especially if we are being pulled by the professors and administration, and not the state. Furthermore, we students want the University open, even if it must operate poorly as a result of severe cutbacks. The citizens of Massachusetts have their own worries (i.e. local aid) and have been proven in the past to have a limited concern for public higher education. Purposefully planning to close the University would say in no uncertain terms to the citizens that the University is a money pit and that its funds would be best spent elsewhere. In addition, this ploy would play right into the hands of Governor Weld, who has threatened to shut down several state colleges, without the added excuse that they purposefully spent themselves into bankruptcy.

If the University ever closes, its reliability as a state-run institution will be severely flawed. The closing would send a image of a school that cannot pay its excellent professors, runs out of money for its graduate students, and cheats its undergraduates not only out of their money, but their educations as well. I find it hard to understand why a body such as the Massachusetts Society of Professors would advocate such a flawed pieced of thinking. I urge you to reconsider your decision. I hope that the MSP can find a reasonable plan that serves everyone's interests, and one that I as a student can find acceptable.

Hey UMass: vote override!

Education everywhere is under assault. Public education, the key to our state's future, is being decimated, when everyone in the state needs it most. Now is the time to send a message to Weld: No More! the voters must show Weld that education is a priority by voting for the Amherst town override. If a local override for education in a liberal college town does not pass, Weld will never raise taxes to pay for higher education.

UMass-Amherst was once the rising star of state universities. The Amherst public school system shared much of that prestigious reputation. If this override does not pass, we will fall even harder and faster than the university. This year alone, we could lose over 10 percent of our teachers and all of our sports and other extracurricular activities.

These are hard times, but the reason that they are hard times is, in part, because of the lack of support for education for all. Many UMass students have fought the budget cuts, but we can't vote Weld out, yet. UMass students can, however, vote on May 14, to prevent these awful cuts from happening on local level.

Amherst, like UMass, has provided many students, both rich and poor, with a quality education at an affordable price. There are few places left in this state where middle class kids can get ahead. For those of us who can't afford private schools, public education is the only way. It is not fair students have to choose between massive debt and education. Middle class parents will have to borrow thousands if they want their children to have the chance to play sports or be on a debate team.

Most important, however, is that if Amherst fails as a town, the university will be hurt immeasurably. Amherst's highly respected education system and services are what draws many professors to the area. Losing good teachers will hurt the quality of your education. Losing businesses means losing jobs that help pay the ever-increasing cost of public education, at all levels. Thus, we the students have both an enlightened self-interest and the moral obligation to vote for the override tomorrow.

Christ would have attended GLB coffee socials

It is an odd fact that many of the strongest voices raised against homosexuals belong to Christians.

The Bible explicitly teaches that no human being has the spiritual wisdom or understanding to judge another. (Judge not, lest ye be judged. . .) Although the Bible offers many guidelines, it also reminds those who follow it that in the end, all are sinners, and it is only divine grace that allows for individual salvation.

With this in mind it puzzles me that many Christians harass gays. During the pride march six devout members of the Faith Baptist Church stood with signs declaring that gays were sinners doomed to hell. What I want to know is, when did these six members of the Faith Baptist Church get a special contract from God to become judges? How do they know that god sent AIDS as a punishment? And if he did, why do straights and babies also contract it? And why are lesbians the least affected population?

Trystan Skeigh

I am unshakeably convinced that homosexuality is not a sin. But more importantly, I believe the only source capable of judging is divine. I don't know a single gay or lesbian who wouldn't rather take their chances standing before their creator. It has never been God whom gays and lesbians fear. It is his self-righteous, judgemental, and bigoted self-proclaimed "followers" who threaten to destroy our lives.

Being gay does not mean one cannot love god. Some gays and lesbians are Christians, contrary to Ted Maravelias' ignorant assertion that we're all "Godless freaks." Many homosexuals have a rich spiritual life. Without it, some of us could not find the strength to endure society's hatred and judgments.

I believe that Christ was open to all types of people. He was harassed by the Roman government and Jewish council for associating with such social misfits as money lenders, tax collectors, and prostitutes. I have no doubt that there were gays and lesbians among his original followers.

Yet some of his modern-day followers do not hesitate to harass and bash gays.

It's strange how spiritual truths become diluted by human prejudice. There isn't a single Biblical quote by Christ that supports hatred or harassment against gays or any other group. Rather, Christ stressed love, forgiveness and tolerance.

How can a teacher who said "Love thy neighbor as thyself" be considered an inspiration for homophobia? Would Christ have picked up a rock and heaved it at a lesbian or gay? I don't think so.

Rather, I believe he would point at all the homophobes in the world and said: "Let he who has not sinned cast the first stone."

A nude writer bares his soul and reveals the naked truth

It's my belief that Adam and Eve have ruined it for all of us. Just imagine how wonderful it might be if everyone were to roam the earth completely naked. As I sit here, naked, and write these words, I can't possibly express how natural feeling and relaxed I am. You too, could experience these wonderful feelings if you were naked.

"Naked," as opposed to "nude," is a word I like to say, stressing both syllables. It is a word symbolizing one's complete understanding of him or her self. It is an expression of one's openness and display of pride for his or her body. There are many advantages to having a clothing-free environment. Would it not be a complete relief never to have to worry about tan lines? Sun bathers could acquire a more natural, well rounded tan, in return giving them a more wholesome feeling about themselves. Agonizing hours of shopping for clothes would no longer exist. Outdoor bathtubs and showers would appear on every street corner for those who set aside little or no time between a sweaty tennis match and a big date. Indeed, if society accepted nakedness, it would not only save lots of money, but lots of time as well.

Unfortunately, not everyone can always be pleased. Where a state of nakedness might work for you and me, there are others who will find flaws in the concept. Some argue that being naked would make them cold during certain months of the year. However, it is a fact that organic scientists are very close to completing a heat synthesized gel. This is an all over body rub that, when worked into human skin, allows for the regulation of body temperature.

Glenn Morin

Others have failed to provide their body with proper nutrition and other attention over the years. These people are depressed by the shape of their bodies and think the rest of the world might feel the same way. Certainly this is a perfectly legitimate and understandable point. Fortunately, an excellent answer called exercise has already been developed. Yes, the entire population of the earth would become health-conscious. The human body would finally receive the proper attention that clothing has deprived it of for so long. Young and old alike would learn to pass up chocolate cake and ice cream sundaes in order to scarf healthy foods full of nutrition. In turn, people would not only look and feel better, but they would live longer and happier lives.

It has also been brought to my attention that individuals would be embarrassed or feel uncomfortable if they were publicly naked. This is only true because for millions and millions of years society has made it true. I wonder where we would stand on this issue if, since the beginning of time, it was customary for people to cover just their heads and faces and not their bodies. Today, it would be embarrassing to unveil our eyes, mouths and noses to the rest of the world! The point here is that we are an evolving species, capable of adjusting to whatever conditions might come our way — even one of nakedness!

So how about it? Are you ready to take it all off? At this time you may be confused about my intent. You may be completely opposed to, or absolutely thrilled with, such a brave idea. You may giggle at my plea to be natural and free. But on the day that you and I are standing face to face, when you notice a sense of achievement in my eyes and we are both without clothing, then you will realize that being naked is no laughing matter.

Flor de Cana, Fortaleza, Quetzal
Northampton High School
Friday, May 10

Three bands, Fortaleza, Quetzal, and Flor de Cana, provided a comprehensive educational and entertaining panorama of Andean, Caribbean and Latin American sound this past Friday to a crowd of about 300 in Northampton High School.

The performance was a benefit concert to raise funds for John De La Zerda, a member of the bands Fortaleza and Flor de Cana, who was injured recently in an accident.

The evening opened with soulful traditional Andean music by the group Fortaleza. They played the music of the Aymara, Quechua, and Inca ethnic groups. Fortaleza was founded in 1979 with the intention of keeping alive the cultural traditions of the Andes.

The name "Fortaleza" was taken from the ruins of the fortifications of various Bolivian ethnic groups. The current line-up includes Jose Malas from Ecuador, Tito Vargas from Bolivia, and Jose Dias from Cuba (who is filling in for John De La Zerda).

The band played a whole range of string instruments (guitars, charangos), wind instruments (panpipes like zamponas, sankas, toyos; flutes like tarkas, kenas) and percussion (drums, rattles). Their set, lasting about 25 minutes, consisted of compositions which were primarily Bolivian in origin.

The next band, Quetzal, named after a bird found in central America, blended traditional sounds of the Andean instruments with contemporary sounds of synthesizers, drum machines, and the electric bass. The five-piece band included Roberto Clavijo and Eugenio Huanca from Chile, Elizabeth Parata from Colombia, Juan Vasquez from Puerto Rico, and Freddy Chapelliquen from Peru.

Their 35-minute set included compositions from Venezuela, Paraguay, Peru, Chile and Bolivia. Roberto and Eugenio drew extensive applause for their virtuosity in charango and sankas duets, with the rest of the band providing richly textured rhythmic backup. A song dedicated to peace in El Salvador drew an enthusiastic reception from the audience, which included a large segment of Salvadorians.

The next band, Flor de Cana ("Sugar Cane Flower"), roused the audience to their feet with a pulsating set of Pan-American sounds and rhythms, which included salsa, merengue, calypso and reggae.

Hampden art exhibit makes biomorphism a fun concept

By LISA CURTIS
Collegian Staff

Vibrant reds, sombre grays and yellows represent the cycles of birth, death and rebirth in "Transmorphism," the exhibition in Hampden Gallery. The exhibit will continue through May 19.

"Transmorphism" is an exhibition of fiberglass cement sculptures by E. Margaret Curley-Clay for her Master Fine Arts. The title refers to "a change from one state or form into another" according to Ms. Curley-Clay's artist statement.

Ms. Curley-Clay devised an original technique for this series. Ceramic objects are integrated into many of her forms, but she also uses fiberglass cement over wire mesh to create large sculptural forms that crack, split, erode and peel.

"Several people have told me they want to use my method. There is nothing like it on this earth," says Ms. Curley-Clay.

"Initially, I focused on the surface manifestations of these processes expressed in cracking and peeling of ceramic geometric forms. Eventually, my work grew to reflect my increasing fascination with the constant flux of material existence from one state to another," says Ms. Curley-Clay.

The exhibit would seem to be a terrible collection of acid rain architectural victims if it weren't for the beautiful colors peeking through the lifeless gray of the cement.

"The artist is especially delighted with the tension between the 'indestructible' qualities of cement and the dynamic processes that her sculptures express," explains the news release.

"My forms are both biomorphic and

1992 ballot may include tax vote

BOSTON (AP) — An idea being floated to put a tax increase referendum on the 1992 state ballot may be a good step in allowing Massachusetts citizens to define the kind of government they want.

The message from voters now is mixed.

In 1980, the state's voters passed a referendum limiting property taxes, then among the highest in the nation. The move also lowered auto excise taxes.

But last year, voters rejected a referendum that would gave rolled back state taxes.

At the same time, they nominated two candidates for governor who advocated deep spending cuts and elected the most fiscally conservative, William F. Weld.

Weld, a Republican, has promised not to raise taxes during his four-year term.

The budget now being considered by the Legislature would reduce spending growth by more than $2.5 billion, a move needed to balance the 1992 fiscal year budget without new taxes.

The spending reductions are going to mean much leaner social programs than Massachusetts has been used to, will cut aid to cities and towns and will reduce state support for public higher education.

Proponents of the cuts, including Weld, argue that state government grew bigger than the state's citizens could afford.

Advocates for education, state employee unions and human services providers, however, contend the society that will emerge from the cuts will be a crueler place to live for those who can't make it on their own.

Since Weld has no inclination, at least for now, to support taxes, the likelihood of the Legislature rejecting cuts in favor of new revenue is virtually nil.

Weld's party controls enough votes in the Senate to sustain a veto of any tax bills, a veto Weld has promised if any revenue measure happened to emerge.

A tax referendum in 1992, being talked about by some of the groups that defeated last year's tax rollback, would put the decision directly in the hands of the state's voters.

That's about as pure a form of democracy as you can get.

The timing, November of 1992, would give Weld two budgets, the one for the 1992 fiscal year and the one for the 1993 fiscal year that begins July 1, 1992, to put his vision of government into place.

If voters like what they get, or feel it is all the state can afford during tough economic times, the tax increase will fail.

If, on the other hand, voters feel the cuts have gone too far, they will have the option of giving state government more money to restore some of the chopped services.

Bush willing to scrap chem weapons

WAHINGTON (AP) — President Bush announced yesterday that the United States would foreswear the use of chemical weapons "for any reason," including retaliation, if any international agreement to ban such weapons can be reached.

In the past, the administration had contended that nations should be allowed to retain the right to use such weapons in retaliation if attacked by similar weapons.

Bush said he is taking the step in hopes of accelerating negotiations under way in Geneva toward a global ban on chemical weapons.

He also called on all major issues in the negotiations to be resolved by the end of this year, and a treaty ratified by the end of 1992.

"I hope this initiative...will spur other nations to commit themselves equally to this critical objective," Bush said in a statement.

The president said he directed U.S. negotiators to announce the step when the Conference on Disarmament meets in Geneva on Tuesday.

Bush also committed the United States to destroy its entire stockpile of existing chemical weapons within 10 years once an international agreement on eliminating such weapons takes effect.

"The Gulf War has once again raised the specter of chemical weapons and demonstrated that unscrupulous regimes can and will threaten innocent populations with these weapons of terror so long as we permit them to exist," Bush said in a statement.

The United States did not use chemical weapons in Operation Desert Storm, although officials during the war would not rule out the possibility.

In yesteday's statement, Bush declared:

"To demonstrate the United States' commitment to banning chemical weapons, we are formally foreswearing the use of chemical weapons for any reason, including retaliation, against any state, effective when the convention enters into force, and will propose that all states follow suit."

A White House statement also said that the Untied States would drop its previous position that the United States be permitted to keep 2 percent of its current stockpile of chemical weapons, or 500 tons, until all chemical-weapons-capable nations have signed the treaty.

"These steps can move the world significantly closer to the goal of a world free of chemical weapons. I call upon all other nations to join us in the serious and cooperative pursuit of this important goal," Bush said.

geomorphic in origin; ambiguity in these origins is intentional, reflecting my appreciation for the ultimately arbitrary nature of distinctions made between animate and inanimate elemental states," she says. "When I see a rock, I know it was formed from something that was animate at one point."

Everything is symbolic in these primarily large scale hangings and installations. Circles and spheres symbolize life and renewal; the bright colors symbolize optimism and rebirth; and the dark colors represent disintegration and decline.

Ms. Curley-Clay, always carrying a sketch book by her side, divides her time between her twin 11-year-old daughters, directing the Hampden Gallery, creating in her home studio, and teaching classes at UMass.

With a beaming face she expressed her feelings about art. "It is you coming out. There is no right and no wrong. My work is very optimistic. I have a lot of hope for mankind."

The first piece in her series is glazed earthenware in the shape of a cone. Red polka dots peek out from it's cracking surface of yellow and butterscotch. The artist obviously pays very close attention to detail with her ability to make this clay appear to peel.

"Genesis Pod" has a futuristic feel to it. It is a dark gray sphere with thin rivers of red running from the hole in its front to its rear. Red balls are set into the inner craggy surface. The outside is sculpted like frosting on a cake.

"Androgeny" is a bright red sphere cracked open like Pac-Man with glazed ceramic balls set into the "chunky cottage cheese look" of the middle. Ms. Curley-Clay says the purpose of this piece is to analyze the process of rebirth from the angle of life reproducing itself.

Motivated by huge ambitions of working with much larger pieces and possibly working with steel in the future, she said, "I'm very optimistic. Life is fun, you know."

Their six-member line-up included Rosemarie Straijer-Amador on lead vocals and bongos, Brian Folkins-Amador on guitar, Hector Cancel on congas, Laura Burns on electric bass, Willie Sordillo on saxophone, and Eugenio Huanca (who was filling in for John De La Zerda) on charango and sankas.

The group excelled in vocal harmonies, with stellar performances by the lead vocalist Rosemarie Straijer-Amador. Percussionist Hector Cancel wove intricate rhythms around each of the band's compositions, which kept the audience on their feet for a good 40 minutes.

The grand finale featured two songs performed by all the three bands together on the stage for the first time. It was an interesting mix of Latin American and Andean sounds.

The band members were available for interviews before and after the show, and provided insightful perspectives on the way they perceived their music.

John De La Zerda, one of the founding members of Fortaleza, came to the United States from Bolivia 12 years ago. He was encouraged to stay on and spread, through his music, awareness of the social and political realities of the people of Latin America, especially the indigenous people.

"Next year is 1992, and will mark the 500th anniversary of the arrival of Columbus," De La Zerda said. "While some celebrate it as an exciting new chapter of exploration and discovery, I do not and will not celebrate Columbus Day, because to me it represents the beginning of the destruction of the native people, their tradition, and their culture. Through my work, I help spread awareness of their musical heritage and history."

Eugenio Huanca, a member of Quetzal, came from Chile four years ago and plans to return soon. Addressing the social and political climate in Chile and its implications for musicians' freedom, Eugenio said that ever since the CIA-backed coup which ousted Allende, several groups like Inti-Illimani were forced into exile because of the message their music carried.

"Chilean music shows how the people feel, and tells our history," Eugenio said. "Things seem to be improving now, however, and hopefully freedom of expression will be restored to all people soon," he said.

Rosemarie Straijer-Amador, manager and lead vocalist of Flor de Cana, said their music carried humanist messages of peace, hope, and justice. "In addition to our lyrics, we also try to convey this educational message by blending together different influences like flamenco, jazz, Andean, Latin American and Caribbean sounds. Our bilingual and bicultural line-up, with members from all over the Americas, also reflects our philosophy."

Freddy Chapelliquen from Peru and Elizabeth Parata from Colombia, members of Quetzal, said they would prefer to stay on in the United States because of the "better political and social climate."

"But we will continue to broaden people's awareness of the music, history, geography and languages of the people of Latin America," they said. "We also do fundraising for local community organizations and movements."

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Listen carefully to catch the drift at business meetings. Timing is your secret weapon. A self-improvement program will boost your self-esteem. Short business trips could prove profitable.

"She had a great year and she was a real workhorse for us," Sortino said. "Darlene is just an exceptional person and pitcher. She has done everything that I have asked of her this season. Darlene's a great kid to have around.

"I am proud of both [Aprile and Claffey] each in their own right," Sortino said. "They are very different types of kids but both are tremendous players."

Sortino herself couldn't avoid the winners' circle and was named A-10 Coach of the Year. Sortino, along with assistant coach Gina Lamandra, coached UMass to a perfect 12-0 conference record. This was the first time in league history that a team had gone undefeated in league play. Last week Sortino was also named the Northeast Region's Coach of the Year.

"Obviously winning the award means something," she said. "However it tends to go hand-in-hand with being A-10 Champions, so the Northeast award, with its broader base, is more meaningful to me."

"This is one of the most talented teams I have ever been associated with but, for me, when I coach a team with less talent and still succeed, that is when I'm coaching my best."

Fellow Minutewomen joining Claffey and Aprile on the A-10 All-Conference Team were shortstop Barb Mareau (.445, 6 home runs, 34 RBI) and catcher Cherie DellAnno (.352, 3 home runs, 17 RBI). "Barb has a tremendous bat," Sortino said. "I can't think of too many who could bat .445 (seventh in the nation) with the schedule we play. Barb could have very easily won A-10 Player of the Year."

"Cherrie also had a big year for us," Sortino continued. "She is a tremendous athlete and she brings a wonderful enthusiasm to our club and that enthusiasm is contagious."

Senior Chris Collins was named to the A-10 All-Academic Team. Collins is batting .266 for the Minutewomen with 17 RBI, one of which was the game-winner in Saturday's A-10 semifinal against Rutgers. The team captain, Collins is a mechanical engineering major with a 3.1 grade point average and will work for NASA after graduation.

"I am very, very proud," Sortino said. "Chris has so much heart – she has come back from a serious shoulder injury to be a very vital part of our team."

"I am excited that our players got the recognition they deserve," summed up Sortino. "As for myself, what means the most to me is that the kids believe in the program, they leave here good people, they go to classes and they all graduate."

for us and she is a major reason why we have enjoyed the success we have this season. I mean [21] wins, you can't argue with that."

This season Claffey has racked up the awards and honors including Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Year, New England All-Star and A-10 All-Star.

Claffey has always seen success while on a softball diamond. From the first time she picked up a softball she has loved the game, and the game has loved her back.

"I started playing competitively in third grade, and I just took off from there," Claffey said. "I guess at first my success was due mainly to just natural talent."

Claffey took that natural talent and and became a star in high school. She was named to the Connecticut All-State team three times and took Connecticut Player of the Year honors twice. Subsequently Claffey was recruited heavily by schools like Providence, Fairfield, Connecticut and UMass.

"I chose UMass because I really liked the school itself and the coaches here," Claffey said. "They had both the academics and the athletics that I wanted, and they had my major; environmental health."

Environmental health would explain the big book and her constant commitment to studying. Claffey received a 3.51 last semester.

"The amount this girl studies is disgusting," teased teammate Stacey Nichols.

Her work habits do not just apply to the library but to the field also.

"Darlene has done everything that I have ever asked her to do," Sortino said. "She works hard for us in practice and that pays off in the games. She is a very dedicated kid."

"Darlene got everything she deserved when she won [Pitcher of the Year]," teammate Cherie DellAnno said. "She works so hard, and it's good to see people get the things that they deserve. It's good when all that hard work and dedication pays off."

Both Sortino and Claffey feel that a continued commitment to working hard should help her improve on her already impressive abilities.

"Darlene is still a baby, just a pup," Sortino said. "She still has a long way to go to reach her potential. I think her true growth is going to be in the next two years."

"I can definitely improve, I am nowhere near being at my best," Caffey added. "When I go home this summer I am going to concentrate on improving my drop pitch. I haven't been using it much this season. I've relied on the fastball."

If Claffey improves much more there will be some long games ahead for opponents and happy times for UMass.

"Darlene is just an exceptional person, on and off the field," Sortino said. "If I could, I would like to clone four or five Darlene Claffey's to have on my team."

If that occurred, one thing would be certain; there would be a lot more studying going on during UMass roadtrips.

ed the largest problem to the light eight as they faced several heavier competitors.

Head coach Dave Trond said he was very pleased with the boat's performance at the Vails.

Trond attributes much of the season's success to the seasoned rowing of the boat's six graduating seniors.

One of the eight, Chris Marino, has been invited to participate in a Pre-Elite Olympic program this summer. There Marino will row with some of the nation's top collegiate athletes.

The JV men and first novice lightweight eight advanced to the semifinals as well.

Women's coach Debbie Fine said the varsity women improved a lot during the season, its highlight a silver medal at the New England Championship.

The JV women advanced to the semifinals at the Dad Vails and .08 seconds denied them a place in the finals.

A-10 recognizes achievements of Aprile, Claffey, Sortino

Sophomore Darlene Claffey (21-5) has struck out 111 batters, has four no-hitters and 15 shutouts. She was named Atlantic 10 Player of the Year, A-10 All-Star and New England All-Star.

ALLENTOWN, Pa. — When a team dominates a conference like the University of Massachusetts softball team has this year, it should come as no surprise that it also dominates the conference's postseason awards.

Only Temple's Angela Prinos (Rookie of the Year) was able to prevent a UMass sweep of year-end awards as Holly Aprile was named Atlantic 10 Player of the Year for the second consecutive year, Darlene Claffey took Pitcher of the Year honors and head coach Elaine Sortino won the Coach of the Year award.

Aprile, a junior, turned in big performances for the Minutewomen both at the plate and on the mound. The Afton, N.Y. native batted .399 on the season with two home runs and 34 runs batted in and lead the A-10 with 17 doubles. While pitching, Aprile was just as impressive, going 17-6 with a 1.18 earned run average and two saves.

"Holly is just a total player, an all-around winner," said Sortino. "To win this award two years in a row is quite an accomplishment. She is a tremendous pitcher, a tremendous fielder and a tremendous hitter. Holly is as good of an athlete as I have ever coached.

"She is such a valuable part of this team. I don't even have to mention her intensity level, it is simply unmatched. If I was going to war I would want Holly Aprile on my side, she will do anything to win."

Aprile was named A-10 Rookie of the Year 1989 and twice this season took Player of the Week honors.

This season, Claffey, a sophomore from Ledyard, Conn., emerged as the premiere pitcher of the A-10. She registered a 21-5 record with a 1.05 ERA both tops in the A-10. Claffey also took conference honors in strike outs (111), shutouts (15) and starts (28). Claffey pitched four no-hitters on the season, accomplishing the feat against Maine, Rhode Island, Hartford (back-to-back) and St. Joseph's. She took Pitcher of the Week honors thrice this season.

"I never really thought about winning [the award] but I was happy when it happened," Claffey said.

Young presence on the mound

While on the bus to and from Allentown, Pa., Darlene Claffey sat quietly in her seat studying from an obscenely thick textbook. While the rest of her teammates fooled around, slept or teased each other, Claffey quitely blended into the crowd.

If you weren't looking for her you wouldn't know she was there.

The exact opposite is true when Darlene Claffey steps onto a softball field to pitch. Claffey becomes the focal point of not only her fellow players but everyone in attendance.

When Darlene Claffey is pitching everyone knows where she is, and rightfully so.

This season the sophomore has put up some phenomenal numbers for the University of Massachusetts softball team. Claffey is 21-5, her ERA is 1.05, she has pitched 15 shutouts and four no hitters, she has held opponents to a .171 batting average while striking out 111 of them.

"Darlene stepped up this season to pitch about as well as a player can pitch," coach Elaine Sortino said. "She had a great year

Wrapping up postseason with honor

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY

Just like in the regular season, the University of Massachusetts baseball team needed only one win over Rutgers Sunday to become tops in the Atlantic 10 Conference.

Unfortunately, history repeated itself and UMass got swept out of the A-10 Championship, by scores of 5-4 (10 innings) and 8-3. Rutgers became the A-10 Champs for the fourth time in sixth years.

UMass needed to win the first game on Sunday to determine the A-10 Championship, but Scott Meaney had a rough outing, as he hit two batters, walked two, and was plagued by the team's two errors in the first inning. Rutgers built a 3-0 lead before reliever Jeff Toothaker put out the fire.

After giving up a homer to second baseman Chris McAlindin in the second inning, Toothaker settled down and pitched marvelously, going nine innings in relief.

Meanwhile, the UMass offense was busy battling back in the game, but it was all they could do to tie the score. The Minutemen had many opportunities, yet left six runners in scoring position.

Their best chance was in the eighth with Dave Edwards on third with two outs. Mike Tobin smashed a Jim Kohl pitch deep to right field, which would have been a homer with no wind. Angel Echevaria, an error-ridden right fielder, raced back to the warning track and made a game-saving catch.

In the bottom of the 10th, with UMass behind 5-4 on a Mike Winchock run batted in single, John Carelli led off with a single. With two outs and Carelli now on second, Tobin hit a routine grounder that Rutgers shortstop Winchock threw high to the first baseman Steve Michaels.

Michaels dropped the ball, picked it up and fired it to catcher Mike Higgins as Carelli charged home. Carelli appeared to slide over the small portion of home that Higgins hadn't blocked, but Higgins slapped on the tag and the umpire called Carelli out to end the first game.

In the second game, Rutgers blew the game open with six runs in the eighth inning to win, 8-3.

The Minutemen finished the post season with many bright spots, however. They had three players on the first team A-10 All-Conference team. Shortstop Glenn DiSarcina, catcher Derek Dana and left-handed pitcher Ron Villone were the honered players.

The notable exclusion from both the first and second All-Conference teams was right fielder Brian Bright. Bright was an All-New England player last year and led the team in home runs (10), doubles (16) and RBI (43) this season. Bright hit .307 for the year and made three assists in the outfield.

These statistics, combined with Bright's freshman and sophomore years, may be enough for Bright to be selected in the major league June draft, but they were not good enough for the Atlantic-10 coaches.

Two Minutemen named to the Atlantic-10 All-Academic team were sophomore left-handed pitcher Scott Meaney and senior center fielder Mike Tobin. Meaney is an arts and sciences major with a 3.31 grade point average, while Tobin will graduate with a degree in history and a 3.63 GPA.

Crew strokes 7th

More than 105 crew teams from the United States and Canada showed up this weekend in Philadelphia for the National Championship Dad Vail Regatta.

The University of Massachusetts varsity men's crew team, participated in the premier event of the competition and came in fourth behind Temple, Georgetown and Virginia.

The varsity eight defended its New England Championship crown, defeating all previous competition.

The men won their quarter-final heat on Friday, and edged out Williams by a small margin to take third in the semifinals.

The competition came from within for the University of Massachusetts women's track team this weekend. School records and personal records were being broken all day in five events when the Minutewomen competed in the New England Track and Field Championships hosted by Northeastern in Dedham.

UMass placed seventh overall, three points shy of the top five. Schools that fell behind the outstanding performances of the team included Springfield, New Hampshire, Dartmouth, Vermont and Boston College — all of whom had previously beaten UMass in the regular season.

Simone Marisseau threw the shot 6½ inches beyond her own school record of 40 feet, 11½ inches, landing at the 41-6 mark.

Diane Ozzolek placed third in the hammer throw. The tape was marked at 151-5 for Ozzelek's last throw of the regular season. Although not a personal record, the throw was only 1 inch shy of it.

Kathy Holt and Cate Dean placed third and fourth respectively in the 10,000-meter race with times of 39 minutes, 51.03 seconds and 40:00.79. They finished ahead of higher-ranked competitors and added more points to the team's total.

Mo Meldrim and Lynn Kirchoff also put points on the board with their run in the 1,500. Meldrim placed fifth in 18:04.82 and Kirchoff placed ninth in the event.

Tana Henderson set a personal record in the 200 dash. She crossed the line with a time of 26.48.

Breaking a six-year-old school record, Lee Ann Ambrose ran the 800 in 2:09.42, beating the old record of 2:10.10. She finished second behind Boston University's Jen Lanctot. Lanctot, who entered the race ranked third in the na-

Book on Philadelphia bombing wins award

By ALISON BUCKHOLTZ
Collegian Staff

John Wideman takes risks, and his last one just paid off.

On May 1, Wideman, a UMass English professor and nationally-acclaimed fiction writer, was awarded the PEN/Faulkner Award for Fiction for his 1990 novel, Philadelphia Fire. It is Wideman's second award from the prestigious society, founded and judged by other writers, making him the first two-time winner.

Philadelphia Fire, Wideman's 10th book, recounts a recent event controversial enough in its own right: the 1985 bombing of a Philadelphia row house operated by the back-to-nature cult MOVE, a predominantly Black organization. Eleven people died in the bombing, which was followed by several rounds of ammunition.

"They killed those people three or four times over," Wideman said, recollecting his research for the book. "The murder was perpetrated by 300 policemen on a house containing mostly women and children."

Anger and fear of the public's "collective amnesia" impelled Wideman toward his subject. "The moment I heard about the fire I knew I'd have to write about it," he said. "For the next two years, I was constantly researching: watching videotapes, reading commission reports, reading about it. I went to Philadelphia five or six times."

But Wideman, who grew up in Homewood, Pennsylvania, a neighborhood similar to MOVE's, found that his "unconscious research" was just as valuable. "I knew the turf," he said. "It was my world, my people."

Wideman's less traditional research led him to a crucial realization. "I walked around the parks of Philadelphia, felt the grit in the air," he said. "Then it came to me: if I had been in the park the day of the fire, in my eyes would have been that smoke, the ash of the people that were killed — the kids. But ash rises up, it stays in the mist. I knew their ash would be there forever."

Wideman's committment to memorializing the event soon grew even stronger. "I went to a memorial service two years after the fire," he remembered. "It was widely publicized, with lots of speakers. A true commemoration. But only about 50 people showed up — more TV and media people that participants. That's what cemented it in my head that this cannot die."

The event was "too awful" to be absorbed into public memory. "No one wanted to think about the ramifications, their own guilt," Wideman said. "I wrote Philadelphia Fire to bring it back into public consciousness."

Once Wideman decided to write the book, technique became his primary concern — and his second risk. "The most difficult decision was whether I wanted to do documentary reportage or just make it a story, my story," he remembered. "What's hardest in any story is to do it your own way, manuever the guesswork, go out on a limb. That's why writing appeals to me."

Wideman's attraction to stylistic risk in Philadelphia Fire met with initially mixed critical reviews, which termed the book

CAG prepares for upcoming congressional election

By ALEX DERING
Collegian Staff

Absentee ballot applications for the June 4 special election for the First Congressional District Seat are being distributed by the Commuter Area Government to registered student voters.

The June 4 date for the election, selected by Gov. Weld, was chosen because it will lessen the voice of student voters, claimed Susan Church, president of the CAG.

"Weld set the election date to keep out the higher education voice," she said. "Most of the students and most of the professors will be gone for the summer and once again the voice of higher education will be left out of the voting process."

Gov. Weld's office did not return a call from the Collegian requesting a response to Church's claim.

Church, who is helping to organize the absentee ballot drive along with members of the CAG, said students make up a significant group of the electorate and should make sure their voices are heard in this election by registering in Amherst and by voting through an absentee ballot.

"We had a great success with the primary," said Church. "Now, instead of trampling flower beds and taking over buildings, we're getting phone calls from politicians asking for our help. When they call we say great, but what can you do for higher education?"

Ken Kaplan, a student activist working with the Commuter Area Government on the absentee ballot drive, agreed students are starting to turn out in greater numbers to vote on issues that concern them and that those increased numbers are getting noticed more and more by the general population and by politicians.

"When you get about 1,000 students voting, a lot of people start to realize that we are serious about this," he said. "If you tell the students what the issues are and let them make up their minds, they will go out and vote."

Students who have not yet registered to vote in Amherst may still do so at the Town Hall, but today is the last day to do so for the June 4 election.

Absentee ballot applications should be filled out and returned to the Amherst Town Hall, where it will be processed. A blank absentee ballot will then be sent to the address given by the student. The completed absentee ballot is then mailed back by the student.

Church also suggested students return their absentee ballot applications before they leave for the semester so the Town Hall will have time to process the forms.

MassPIRG wraps up another year

By AMY HENRY
Collegian Staff

Are you involved in a registered student organization that has not planned many events this semester? If you were in the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group you would not have had a quiet moment yet.

Michele Palazzo, a junior University of Massachusetts environmental science and forestry major, coordinated a statewide campaign called the energy efficiency project. Each semester MassPIRG works on two local and statewide campaigns.

Earlier this semester, Palazzo headed an endorsement campaign to get faculty and administrators to sign the MassPIRG Greenhouse Reduction bill. He, and other MassPIRG members, garnered 140 faculty and administrator's endorsements from the UMass campus and MassPIRG chapters around the state. They gathered a total of 520 signatures.

In addition, 580 postcards from students, faculty and staff and community people were collected and brought to legislators.

Palazzo said, "The bill would provide incentives for contractors to build more energy efficient buildings and provide incentives for fuel efficient cars."

Developers of large new energy-efficient buildings would be given bonuses, financed by assessments on

Gay rights bill passes in 4 states

By SARAH DEMASTER
Collegian Staff

Shawn Cotter is optimistic.

With Connecticut and Hawaii having recently passed gay civil rights bills, bringing the total number of states with such laws to four, Cotter sees a positive trend.

"It's not a unique situation," said Cotter, a sophomore communications/literature major at the University of Massachusetts. "I think we'll see in the future that more states will pass gay civil rights bills, because of a whole shift in the media. The Gay Rights movement is starting to have positive effects — it's great."

Another state, Oregon, could soon be added to this list of states with gay civil rights bills, which also includes Wisconsin and Massachusetts. The Oregon bill, which says gays, lesbians and bisexuals will not discriminated against for housing and employment, last week passed the Oregon Senate by a vote of 19-11. The bill is now in the House where its "chances look less favorable," said Marc Overbeck, legislative aide to Gov. Barbara Roberts.

He added, however, "The governor will sign the bill if it comes across her desk. She was one of the first ones to sign it."

Despite these apparent victories, an area resident, who did not wish to give her name, said she remains skeptical.

"My politics are a lot more radical," she said. "Yes, it's a victory, but it's not enough. I don't know about the other states, but in Massachusetts, rights to housing and employment are protected, but a lot of gay couples really want things like being on each other's insurance policies and having children.

"I would like to see a law saying that gay bashing is not acceptable," she said.

Cotter agreed that Massachusetts laws do not extend far enough. "Sodomy laws are still on the books [in Mass.]. There are still no legalized marriages for gay, lesbian and bisexual couples, and that's as much a right of gay, lesbian and bisexual people as of anyone else."

While the Hawaii bill also covers job discrimination, the Connecticut bill extends beyond these laws to address discrimination for credit ratings and state services as well.

Rep. Joseph S. Grabarz Jr. (D-Bridgeport), said he supported the Connecticut bill, an issue which had been debated in the state legislature for 17 years, "Because I'm a gay man."

He added: "I think there's an incredible rise of intolerance [in the United States]. For example, the election in Louisiana in which 605,000 people voted for David Duke, knowing full well what he stood for — that scares me."

Grabarz said he was also disturbed by "a rush toward fascist-style patriotism in the last military action. Whether you agree or disagree, [the attitude] 'Be like us or else' — that scares [gays, lesbians, and bisexuals]."

Rep. William L. Wollenberg (R-Farmington), who opposed the bill, said, "The main reason is it's special unnecessary legislation. There's no proof for any need of it. In the nine years I've been here, we've had hearings and . . . two or three people said they had been denied housing or jobs [because of their sexual orientation].

"This bill is broad-sweeping. It's the forerunner of gay rights courses in schools, etc. It's fraught with affirmative action — race and religious background is an entirely different issue from choosing [to be gay, lesbian, or bisexual]."

anything from "ragged and lyric" to "confusing and riveting." The New York Times Book Review, however, praised its focus on the "grit and greed, the despair and honor of urban life experience." Similarly, its theme of obligation to one's time led PEN/Faulkner judge Percival Everett to call it "the real thing."

Although Wideman is familiar with that urban life and has written about it widely, Philadelphia Fire does not contain the same type of autobiographical elements as his previous novels. The passion, however, is just as prominent.

"Fiction is stuff you make up, and I made Philadelphia Fire up," he said. "One of its subjects, though, is what happens when you're writing about something you care intensely about. The experience explodes, does not allow itself to be confined in a book. That's what happened here. The writer can't treat it all; it's about a subject you can't control."

For Wideman, democracy is the uncontrollable subject. "The problem is intolerance and fear," he said. "Fear of difference. Preaching democracy but not dealing with the differences when you want something. It's the tyranny of the majority."

Parallels are evident in the recent Gulf War: "It's about overkill," Wideman said. "If you demonize people, that's the first step. You can do anything to them."

Wideman's next project, on South Africa, directly addresses the question of democracy. "The issue is not buried for me [after Philadelphia Fire]," he said. "It's a continuing worry of mine, since I'm a member of a minority group. But it should be relevant to everyone. You never know when political belief, injury, or anything unexpected will suddenly make you a prisoner, a minority."

Wideman's worries were not always of global importance. As an All-Ivy basketball player at the University of Pennsylvania, he decided early in his college career that, "I wanted to be a ballplayer in the NBA. When that didn't happen, being a writer seemed the next best thing so I wouldn't have to get a job."

After receiving a Rhodes Scholarship to study at Oxford University in England, he began to concentrate on writing, and broadened his attention to the rest of the arts. Film and music, he said, taught him "a lot about telling a story."

Wide reading also broadens one's storytelling abilities:

"Read fiction, all kinds of fiction," Wideman recently advised his undergraduate fiction-writing class. "You know you're serious when you begin to make decisions based on your desire to write. That's what I did."

inefficient new buildings, a MassPIRG fact sheet stated. The bill would establish a home energy rating system for all new homes and a voluntary program for existing homes, the sheet stated. A reduction of energy waste in government buildings by requiring energy efficient lighting and encouraging energy management contracts would decrease the energy costs in state and local government budgets, the sheet stated.

In addition, a sliding scale sales tax in each size class of a car would charge less sales tax on a car depending on its size, Palazzo said.

"That doesn't mean that if you bought a big car you'd pay more," he said. "If you bought a truck your sales tax would be charged depending on which size it was. We realize people have big families and we don't want to penalize them for buying a big car."

The bill is still going through the legislature.

On April 13, students gathered sponsors to clean-up area shelters for their "hunger and homelessness" campaign. About $1100 was made, 50 percent went to local shelters and 50 percent went to the UMass Home Share program which matches up people who need a place to live with available homes.

A recycling campaign collected 31 business endorsements and 60 faculty endorsers. On April 18, students lobbied at the Statehouse presenting the endorsements and speaking to state legislators.

In addition, the most recent campaign which will continue throughout the semester has been collecting food, clothing, and furniture in residence halls to give to local shelters.

Between April 22-26 MassPIRG held an "Energy Efficiency" week. Palazzo said the week was designed to educate people on how they could be more efficient with their energy use. MassPIRG had a table on the Concourse where literature on how to be energy efficient was distributed. They also held an energy efficient raffle in which people took a transportation pledge to take a more energy efficient mode of transportation. People who participated in the pledge were given energy efficient light bulbs.

One day during "Energy Efficiency" week was devoted to alternative energy where members of MassPIRG collected signatures for an energy efficiency petition to support the national fuel efficiency bill for cars, as well as to support the funding and research for conservation and renewable energy sources. The petition also opposes President Bush's recently proposed energy policy, Palazzo said. After all of the signatures are collected nationwide, they will be presented by a USPIRG representative and coalition members to the U.S. Senate.

Students who worked on the "Environmental Education" project during the semester went to 12 elementary schools and taught the students about environmental issues.

Next semester the group plans to continue their "hunger and homelessness" campaign, start a toxics use reeducation campaign, conduct a questionnaire on a consumer issue and plan to get a referendum on the November ballot.

UMass history discussed by faculty members

By HEIDI McCANN
Collegian Staff

"The University of Massachusetts: The Ordeal of the Public Sector," a paper written by University of Massachusetts history professor Ron Story, was the subject of a "theater of ideas" held by the Institute for the Advanced Study in the Humanities, which focused on the past history of the University and its future in light of recent budget cuts.

The panelists included many faculty members as well as Women's Studies professor Lee Edwards and Provost O'Brien.

The discussion, held last night in the Campus Center, was moderated by UMass English professor Jules Chametzsky who said Story's paper illuminated the many crucial issues facing the University today.

"The paper raises the important questions of where we came from and who we are," Chametzsky said. "We must come together as faculty to make a core of people aware of what the issues are."

Following his brief opening statement to the discussion, Chametzsky gave a brief outline of Story's 13-page paper which was originally given as part of the Historic Deerfield Winter Lecture Series on March 21.

Provost O'Brien called Story's paper an exceptional work.

"While others dutifully describe the University's history. . .Story steps to see the overall trends," said O'Brien.

O'Brien's perception of the history of the University, however, deviated from Story's.

Story's paper gave credit to past University leaders for initiating the major changes at the University, while O'Brien said he gave too much credit to the leaders.

"To tie [the paper] so closely to leadership driven phases weakens it," O'Brien said.

"Mass research universities are a remarkably new invention, and unfortunately we entered late in a time when many are unsympathetic and uninterested in education," Edwards said.

Edwards' solution for the University's problems was to tie undergraduate teaching to research and scholarly activity. The key to her plan revolved around the premise that today there are more alumni than ever before in the University's history, she said.

According to Edwards, "We need to form a community of UMass alumni and we need to have them identify themselves as having a connection to us."

Story deemed his work "a gloomy and pessimistic paper," while expounding on its major theme involving the cycles he found in the University's history. According to these cycles, Story said, "There has to be an upward trend."

Students raise funds for Israeli scud relief

By JESSICA BROOMFIELD
Collegian Correspondent

When push comes to shove, people are people. Despite cultural or political differences, it can be as simple as that, as the overwhelming response to a Scud Relief raffle campaign proved recently.

The UMass Scud Relief Committee, a student group formed after a Tel Aviv, Israel neighborhood was destroyed by Scud missiles launched during the Gulf War, recently raised $2,000 through a campus raffle, according to group members.

Tamara Silberman and David Day, two of the raffle organizers, decided to act after watching news reports of Scud attacks on Israel during the Gulf War.

"Tamara and I felt so bad for these people. Their homes and lives were being destroyed," Day said.

Esther Mattes, another group member, said she wondered if local businesses would donate goods for a relief raffle. A few weeks later, she said, the campaign was ready — for the price of a $1 ticket, students had the chance to win dozens or prizes from local merchants.

Bruggers Bakery volunteered a dozen bagels as a prize, and others soon followed suit: Seasons Restaraunt donated a gift certificate and Knowles printers printed the tickets for free.

A compact disk player, tickets at the Fine Arts Center and Red Sox tickets were also raffled away to area students. Awards were distributed at a Blue Wall dance in late April, Mattes said.

The Scud Relief check has already been taken to Israel by a friend of the Hillel program director, who will give it directly to the mayor of Tel Aviv. It will be used to rebuild the Hatikvah neighborhood, one of the oldest neighborhoods in Israel and the hardest hit by Scud missiles. Ironically, the area contains a heavy concentration of Iraqi Jews.

Lesbian loses appeal

Court refuses her custody of disabled lover

By TRYSTAN SKEIGH
Collegian Staff

After seven years of heartbreaking and costly legal battles, this time Karen Thompson felt sure the Minnesota District Court would allow her disabled lover Sharon Kowalski to come home with her.

But on April 24, in a bizarre ruling that devastated Thompson, her attorneys, and Kowalski's medical team, Judge Robert Campbell denied Thompson's petition and instead awarded guardianship to "a neutral third party."

Thompson has been fighting to be reunited with Kowalski for over seven years, since Kowalski was disabled in a car accident that left her in a wheelchair. Thompson has written a book, "Why Can't Sharon Kowalski Come Home?" detailing the long and intricate legal battle for guardianship, which she blames on homophobia and ablism within the Minnesota legal system.

In a telephone interview Tuesday, Thompson said Campbell's decision to grant guardianship to Karen Tomberlin, a friend of the Kowalski family, was a clear violation of the Minnesota statute on guardianship.

"[According to the law] to request guardianship, a person must first file a petition, then serve papers to all interested parties, in this case me, give them time to respond, and if there are objections, there must be an open public hearing," Thompson said.

Thompson said Campbell ignored all of these steps, when he arbitrarily assigned guardianship to Tomberlin during Thompson's guardianship hearing.

According to Thompson, Tomberlin attended the hearing to argue against Thompson receiving full custody of Kowalski. Thompson said the idea of Tomberlin receiving guardianship arose when an attorney rhetorically asked Tomberlin "if she wanted to be Kowalski's guardian instead."

Thompson said although Tomberlin said she didn't have time to take on guardianship responsibilities, the judge stunned the courtroom with a ruling that Kowalski would be better off under Tomberlin's guardianship, and that she must remain at Trevilla rehabilitation center in Robbinsdale.

Although Thompson said her lawyers are not sure, it "looks like" she will retain visitation rights and still be able to take Kowalski home two weekends a month.

Thompson broke down and cried several times during the interview. "I'm the one who has to take her back [to Trevilla]...I see her cry...she doesn't understand why she can't stay home with me..."

She said she has become discouraged since this last legal setback. "Right now I'm living moment to moment, day by day." She began to sob as she said, "I'm tired...I know I have to get further away from the pain..."

Before the accident, Kowalski and Thompson had been closeted lovers and shared a home together for four years. Thompson's first guardianship bid was denied in 1984, when guardianship was awarded to Kowalski's parents. They refused to accept their daughter's relationship and barred Thompson from visiting. They moved their daughter to a nursing home in Hibbing and halted her rehabilitation. Thompson says for those three and a half years Kowalski was treated like a vegetable. "She lost so much recovery possibility while at Hibbing..."

After over 20 appeals, Thompson regained visitation rights two years ago after medical experts testified that Kowalski had clearly communicated her desire to be with Thompson and they believed it was important to Kowalski's well-being for Thompson to be allowed to visit. At that time, the judge also ordered Kowalski moved to a rehabilitation center in Robbinsdale and placed responsibility for her care with the medical staff.

Community should remember outing

Since my outing, I have received a lot of unfulfilled promises and a great deal of apathy. During the first week after the outing, many people expressed concern. Now it seems that many of those people have forgotten. Not only did the LBGA not fulfill their promise to release an official statement condemning the outing and to make provisions to help ensure my education, but it appears that my "outers" have been fully accepted back into the community (assuming they were ostracized in the first place). It is now I who am the victim of ridicule. I asked a Steering Committee member why the statement was never written. He replied that I needed to work on it myself, if I wanted anything done. When I asked why they had promised a written statement and then failed to come through with one, he replied, "They'll say anything you want to hear."

Shouldn't the outing of a member of the LBG community, by other members of this community, be seen as affecting the community? It should not be required of me to debate the politics of outing. I should not be dragged down into a personal defense of my character. I do not feel as if this is my responsibility. I was outed. I was outed not for political reasons, but personal, by people who had a grudge against me and chose to use my queerness as a weapon against me. I find it disturbing that much of the community would ignore the issue in question, choosing to remain on the level of who likes who.

I take the apathy of this community as tacit approval. I am not comfortable walking into the LBGA office. When I do, everyone goes quiet and breaks into laughter when I leave. The apathy and sopohmoric behavior of the LBGA "community" makes me question their ability to serve all gay men, lesbians and bisexuals. What do their actions and lack of actions say to newly out people? How can they feel safe coming to functions and getting involved, when the LBGA never came forward with a public statement condemning the malicious actions of some of its members? What can their impression be, except "Watch your back, you're liable to get stabbed and no one will take notice." My advice to those newly out, or considering coming out at UMass, has to be, at least at present, avoid the LBGA.

What conclusions can I draw from my experience over the past two months? That because of my strong commitment to this community last fall and earlier this semester, I must now pay? That outing is an appropriate means of resolving personal conflicts? That if you do not follow the social rules of LBGA, you can expect to be punished? That you can out someone with no fear of repercussions, since it will be forgotten after a week? That the LBGA consists of a bunch of self-centered, lying, juvenile, apathetic children? You may decide for yourself, I, however, have been forced to draw my own conclusions.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

Attention you mutants who collectively share a brain cell

I have emerged from the granola factory intact.

Well, sort of.

It's strange, actually, how everyone here thinks this place is full of earthy-crunchy hippies who smoke dope all the time. It's also filled with beer-swilling frat boys who are constantly pouting since the Collegian isn't a good public relations firm for them, Republican Club mutants who advocate freedom, but then act like a bunch of Nazis to people who aren't Conservatives, professors with Western culture fixations who are positive that some of our more harmless staffers are plotting with the KGB to overthrow America, Mom, and apple pie, and a political climate that ranges from self-congratulatory to paranoid.

I have learned a lot from this place. None of what I learned came from a book. It came from the roach-infested basement with stale air and fluorescent lighting. I finally figured out some of the laws that operate when some poor, hapless sap deals with other poor, hapless saps at UMass.

Any man who says he isn't sexist usually is. Sorry, fellas, but to all of you who kept feeding me that line, all I can say is you are an inspiration to anyone who'd want to make the Mojave desert fertile. Give me a break. Some of these same men would tell me about how a woman who yelled was hysterical (funny, but any man who did the same thing was a strong leader), how feminists really have no case (suuuure we don't), and how they would really like to hit some "bitch" they were mad at. (And we don't have a case?)

Pamela McCarthy

Don't take anything for granted. At all. When I became the associate editor, and then the editor of the editorial page, I had to work with a wide range of columnists. One of them was called Rusty Denton. Rusty, being a born-again Christian, and I, being a feminist, didn't agree on the color of the sky, let alone anything political. But I will say one thing for Rusty. I was an editor when this place was a boys' club. I had to put up with a lot of attitudes (I still do from many of the self-proclaimed "feminist men" I know). Rusty always treated me with respect. He respected my opinions and my decisions about the page. He never dismissed what I did because I am a woman — which is a lot more than I can say for many of the other yahoos I've had to deal with.

Most of the vocal left- and right-wingers deserve a good, swift kick in the head. This isn't because their opinions are "extreme." It's because of the way they act. They censor each other, they attack each other, they harass each other. Shut up, already. I've seen soapboxers scream about freedom of speech and censorship — until something comes out that offends them. Then, it should be banned. I've seen people talk about how open-minded they are, how they always want to listen to the other side and learn. Unless, of course, the other side contradicts them.

The world has more in it than the Valley. I just want to keep reminding all of you mutants out there who share one brain cell collectively that if you are sick of seeing gays get a whopping two stories in the paper, if you are tired of hearing about multiculturalism, if you don't want to worry about politics, don't despair. The "real world" will welcome you with open arms after your stint here. There, you won't see anything but White, straight, Anglo-Saxon Christian views. Do hold on. I'm sure you can make it, you miniature John Birches, you.

To the first-year students who made it through one whole year of this place, some advice: Don't ever assume that anyone here is morally superior. Believe me, every student will try and tell you they are. Just laugh at them. Because once they find out otherwise, the joke will be on them.

On ducks and phallic buildings

The whole concept of time bugs me. I can never get enough things done with the 24 hours I have every day. Unresearched papers have been piling up again, as always, and I still haven't learned to start studying for finals way before Reading Day.

But maybe if I write down all the things I wanted to do all semester then it would be just as good as having done them. So, here they are:

A.R. Santiago

I've always wanted to swim in the Campus Pond, or at least wade my toes in it. But, for fear that they'd probably resurface looking like a three-eyed half-human, half-dog, or, worse, Guy Glodis, I haven't.

The ducks haven't been looking very happy lately. Maybe all the gook they're finding themselves wading in every day is finally getting to them. One of these days I would like to catch someone maliciously throwing something into the pond and make them eat it. A cigarette butt, week-old bagels, sweaty bras, anything.

I would like to spend more than 30 minutes in the Tower Library without getting nauseated just looking out the window and wondering how hard my fall would be if the building unexpectedly collapsed. Who was it who said that the library is actually a phallic symbol? Enough said.

I wanted to figure out the meaning of life (and my part in it) before my senior year, but I don't think that's going to happen any time soon. All I have so far is that life only starts to suck when you try to figure it out.

What is my purpose here on earth? To torment people who take themselves too seriously, or to join their ranks? If I do make torturing these anal-retentive PCs a lifelong career, would I be a happy and fulfilled person? And what would I tell my grandchildren? If I work for a peace-loving world, can I still get rid of the people I don't like? Questions, questions.

I would like to see the day the Minuteman actually publishes one issue that doesn't mention the Collegian as a means to justify its sorry existence.

If it wants to pretend to be a newspaper that knows everything about morality and ethical journalism, it could at least have the decency to sound halfway intelligent. Or is that asking too much from boneheads who have way too much time on their hands?

Oh, and here's a helpful tip just in case one of its staff members has the unfortunate luck of landing in some boondock in the Philippines (I hope not sometime soon) in their lifetime: If you must pick on anybody, don't pick on Filipinos or their beloved country. We are the nicest, most accommodating people you'll ever meet, but not when our dignity is attacked, even in a rag "newspaper" that drives people to purge themselves before anything else.

Filipinos especially don't like to be called "cannibals," although we don't have any qualms about eating fascist, overgrown remnants of a nuclear explosion, whose idea of looking intelligent is not to look the part. Yum.

So, maybe I'll never have the time to do all the things I've always wanted to in college. But I know what creek I'm up in now, by prematurely declaring them all here. I'll be back next semester. And maybe I'll find myself a good, Collegian-hating Republican body to chew on. Then I'll really have fun.

A.R. Santiago is a Collegian columnist

Going ballistic on student 'leaders'

Well, this is the end of not just the semester, but my entire college career. Like everyone else here who is leaving, I have a few things I want to say — particularly to our student "leaders" — before I go.

For those of you who may not know, I am bisexual. I have only been out since late September, but I have seen a lot going on in the gay, lesbian, bisexual community. Frankly, I am not happy by what I have seen, either.

It's not just the Pride March. While I was appalled by Sarah Dreher's speech accusing the counter-protesters of being "lesbophobic," the real problem for me has been with the LBGA, or more specifically, the attitudes of some of the people in the LBGA.

Katherine Lamothe

Several weeks ago, I went to a bisexuality workshop that was put on for "Strong Gay Days." People at the workshop brainstormed and compiled a list of all the negative aspects of bisexuality, and one of those was the need to "prove" that we were "bi" by dating people of the same sex. Yet, in that very workshop, one woman said essentially that. So sue me for dating two straight men and being interested in a third. They've given me more support than some of these people in the community — most of them, actually. Makes me wonder if the LBGA actually stands for Lesbian Bisexual Gay Attitude. Of course, there have been some good people out there who have helped me and I thank them for it. But there's something else that has bothered me: why is it that people from the community have come down expecting me or my other non-straight colleagues to do a story because we are either gay, lesbian or bisexual? I didn't mind doing stories about the gay, lesbian and bisexual communities; I minded the presumptions of some people that that was all I wanted to do. I liked doing regular news, and I resented being thought of in terms of one (or two, in the case of Women's Issues; but then I was editor and had to give the news section a certain amount of those stories). Nobody has the right to tell me or my colleagues what they should or should not write about.

When I originally came out, in October, I thought the LBGA, and the gay community in general, was fairly strong and supportive. Now I wonder: with friends like these, who needs adversaries like Ted Maravelias? It's a clique-fest and I'm not afraid to say so. Some student leaders these people turned out to be.

Speaking of disappointing student leaders, did you know that Dan Chesnicka was one of the best men's divers that UMass ever had? If he had graduated last spring (he had fulfilled all of his requirements, including credits, last May) he would have been remembered for that, along with being a good senator who knew how the senate should be run. Instead, he chose to stay on here and be Speaker of the Senate. Now he'll only be remembered for the joke about his phone number being 1-800-SELLOUT.

I am convinced, and will remain so, that the SGA structure could have been changed without having to go to the administration for help. That was one of the most boneheaded moves I have ever seen. Oh, I still like Dan and Student Trustee Angus McQuilken; it's just that they should have consulted the students first. Student leadership at its finest, folks! Could be worse, though: if Ken Parker were to run for statewide office, he'd single-handedly destroy the Amazon rainforest with all the paper he wasted in the campaign. Please, Ken, not so much paper next time. And recycle what you do use, rather than letting it rot on the walls on campus.

Speaking of student leaders, is it true that Ted Maravelias is not graduating? Oh well. At least I probably won't see him at Commencement. And on that note, I bid you all farewell and good luck.

'Brothers are forever'

When I was pledging my house I did not know the slightest thing about brotherhood. I thought it meant an unlimited supply of beer, cable TV, intramural teams, parties and so on. I thought it would be something fun to do for a semester.

It took me two years to figure out what brotherhood was all about but I am ever so grateful I did. My house is made up of about 50 individuals. We are from diverse ethnic, religious and class backgrounds. We all have our own ideas, beliefs, ethics and morals. With such a makeup one expects many conflicting interests, and it would be a lie to say that there are not. But when a brother needs support, it is there.

This semester has been very turbulent for my house. The house has had one trying event after another. It's not my place to discuss them. I do feel an obligation to show you something else.

I came out to my house this past semester. Some brothers had already known, but for the most part it was not common knowledge. I did not know what would happen. My house is known for being pretty laid back but is still not immune to many of society's ills. Most brothers probably figured they had never spoken to a gay person before, let alone were friends with one. I must admit at first I felt a couple of brothers being a bit reserved — which was not too surprising considering I was not the most adored brother in the house. I may go so far as to say I may have been an antagonist (at times). But surprisingly many brothers went out of their way to show solidarity. Many came over and told me what was important to them was that I was a brother. They respected me for who I am even if they did not understand it at the time.

As the semester progressed the kindness and support never let up. Many times brothers came up to me just to tell me that they supported me, or that they were proud of me. I've heard stories of other brothers standing up for me in awkward situations. Although I have not seen it, I am quite sure my house has been given a lot of shit because of me.

In such a diverse house I was never expecting everyone to be accepting about it. I expected a lot more controversy. I am proud to say it did not happen. As one brother told me the night of our formal, "You are a brother and that's all that matters." That seems to have been the theme. Thanks to these guys I learned a great deal about friendship, caring, forgiveness, tolerance, brotherhood and Zeta Psi.

Now that I am graduating I will feel a great loss without Zeta Psi, but these guys will always have a special place in my heart. They let me be who I was and never turned their backs on me even when I might have deserved it. I'll never forget it. Friends come and go, but brothers are forever.

Respect Pagans

Recently A.R. Santiago wrote a column on the topic of living off-campus that appeared in the Wednesday, May 1 edition of the Collegian. In that column the word "pagan" was used as a catch-all term meaning inconsiderate rowdiness. I'm sure Ms. Santiago was quite unaware of this, but the word "Pagan" is the name of a minority religion of which there is a group on campus, the UMass Pagan Students Organization. Pagans are often misunderstood and the target of negative stereotypes regarding our morals and day-to-day behavior. The term "pagan" originally meant rowdy and licentious and was used as a pejorative by Christians trying to convert Europe from its indigenous Pagan faith. We would appreciate it if you did not use the word "Pagan" in the future except to refer to any number of nature religions that worship pre-Christian deities, such as Wicca, Witchcraft, Druidism, Asatru, Hellenistic Paganism, and Egyptian Paganism.

■ lesbian loses appeal

Thompson said Kowalski, who was in court on April 24, "very clearly indicated that she wanted to fight this [guardianship]...she feels helpless...afterwards, when I was crying she reached out and hugged me."

Thompson said that although Kowalski "had revealed her capability of understanding in court," the judge refused to allow her to testify in her own behalf during the hearing.

Thompson said Judge Campbell completely ignored the team of medical experts who testified during the trial that Kowalski should be allowed to return home with Thompson.

"The medical people are outraged...Her entire team feels it is time for her to go home with me — there is no doubt in their mind."

Thompson said she definitely planned to appeal the decision. "I think they've gone too far this time...It's just so clear to disability rights groups. Our lawyers believe we'll set a precedent with this one."

Thompson stressed that Kowalski has been severely victimized by an "ablist and homophobic" legal system. "Sharon has already lost so much time for rehabilitation...all we're asking is that she be given a chance to live the highest quality life possible."

THIRD WORLD AFFAIRS

The history and mission of the Third World Affairs page

"I would not accept an opinion simply because it was a product of the times. Fashion, the tyrant of humanity taken in the mass, have no hold on me." Remarks by author and one time freedom fighter from Bengal, Nirad C. Chaudhuri in "Thy Hand Great Anarch: India, 1929 - 1952."

The words of the controversial Indian author are aptly reproduced on a controversial page. After all, the dynamics of this college campus seem to mirror the times we live in. Mind control, selective amnesia, character assassination and double dealing are in fashion. Unfortunately, the substance and content which fuels genuine debate are out of vogue.

The voices raised on this page provoke the use of a staggering array of Machiavellian tactics designed to silence them. These have ranged from boycott of advertising revenues, institutional bigotry and physical threats, to personal slander and orchestrated demands of censorship. Such transparent attempts to deny freedom of expression are clothed in seductive explanations to prevent abuse of editorial privilege.

The Orwellian antics of the self-appointed thought police of Amherst are characterized by a marked unwillingness to address the intellectual challenges embedded in the articles published on this page. There can be no greater proof of the need for dissenting voices on this page than the cries of the censor squad.

The history and goals of the Third World Affairs (TWA) Page need to be restated for those who never witnessed or participated in the events which led to the creation of this entity.

The TWA page was born in the fall of 1989 as a counter to news articles and editorial opinions which denied the possibility of an alternate vision of the world from that accepted in mainstream Northern discourse and institutionalized by monopolistic bodies such as Reuters and the Associated Press, as well as local structures like conventional journalism departments and their devotees.

The movement to create this alternate structure was catalyzed by the repeated bigoted depictions of Palestinians that went on that semester. The page was not created willingly. It was only ceded after a bitter campaign of civil disobedience, and consequent external media attention.

A question well worth contemplating is as follows. Who were the students who cared enough for these issues to take the risks involved in this campaign?

The answer is very revealing. The movement was led by a small group of Third World students and supported by a few Americans who shared their concern. These students had frequently experienced the frustrations of being denied the opportunity to rebut biased opinions in the print media, and were sufficiently outraged to take some action.

Pratip Dastidar

The institutional structures opposed this movement. The majority of the students of Third World nations did not participate, and many saw little need to take action. A small group of African-American and Latino activists joined in solidarity. The legacy of this joint effort was the rare political alliance which united students of color working with the pages.

When the struggle ended, the Black Affairs page (which had been covertly terminated the previous summer) was reinstated and a separate Multicultural Affairs page was retained.

It is not surprising that the institutional structures continue to attempt to undermine the pages. However, it is supremely ironic that some of the loudest voices of this censor's board are from Third world elements who are not even remotely involved with the struggles for the pages and who have joined hands with the majority community in the repression of dissent.

The TWA page appears once every fortnight and is intended to serve as a small counterweight to the barrage of status quo rhetoric about issues relating to the North-South divide. The opinion seen on this page cannot be characterized by the rhetoric of the Left or the Right, and are rarely seen in U.S. print media. Perhaps the limited circulation and relative obscurity of this college paper permits these views to be expressed.

This page is not a platform for reporting routine happenings of interest to Third World students, though its staff frequently do so in the form of articles published in the news section. The mission was defined by those who created this structure and will be upheld by those who work the late hours and cope with the stress that goes with this desk. That mission includes dangerous tasks like explaining the viewpoints of the Iraqi B'aath party on the eve of a war, commemorating the victims of the gas calamity in Bhopal, and of Israeli repression in occupied Palestine, challenging the logic of New Order and Old Ways,. . .

The critics of this page have always failed in their effort to silence it. Those that believe that these opinions are not shared by many in the Third World need only ask these questions — Is it true that the power of the North plays a large part in the suffering of the South? Are there people in the South who resort to all means possible of resistance?

If the answers are in the affirmative, then the opinions of this page reflect the conflict. There are several Americans who respect our efforts to present this conflict in honest terms. After all, dialogue can only occur between those who differ.

On behalf of the TWA desk I would like to thank our numerous supporters in the student body, faculty and community who have stood by us through the years. They may agree with some of the views and differ with others, but they have always respected the spirit of the writers.

This page will continue to speak the unspeakable, and question the unquestionable. When there are no more Third World students on this campus who are sufficiently angered by the farce of "objectivity" and the distortion of truth, then the rationale for a TWA page will cease to exist. Things will return to normal.

For a while. Sometime later a few Third World students will decide to oppose the "ostrich-in-the-sand" attitude adopted by their peers. They will write articles in protest, be denied publication, and learn to organize — the wheel will have turned full-circle.

Brazil: an emerging superpower?

The shadow of the United States colossus still falls heavily over the people of Iraq, where, as with millions of Third World people elsewhere, it has brought death and despair. The empire's shadow has fallen longest and darkest especially on this hemisphere, over Latin America.

Rao/Bernardo

There is one nation in this hemisphere which has beaten back this permanent and pervasive pressure and seems well on its way to becoming a leading world power.

Its Portuguese colonial masters had stifled development for nearly three centuries, but now Brazil has emerged as an industrial giant.

For a long time Brazilian development and policy was closely linked to U.S. actions, but this situation no longer holds. Brazilian dependence on U.S. military technology from World War II onwards was severed in 1977. It built bridges with the newly-established African states as well as the communist bloc.

Initially, Brazil had supported the U.S. struggle to contain communism, but, with the thawing of the Cold War, it took on an increasingly Third World position, and saw underdevlopment as more of a problem than communism. It began to see the world divided more along North-South lines than East-West. It began to stand up, like India, for the equality of less developed nations.

Brazil became the foremost Latin American opponent of U.S. anti-Cuban measures. In 1975, it voted to approve the U.N. resolution which condemned Zionism as a form of racism. In 1979, it recognized the PLO, much to the dismay of the United States.

It has moved towards tighter controls on multinational corporations and payments for foreign technology. Brazil has also refused to sign the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, an instrument of U.S.-U.S.S.R. policy of freezing world power.

U.S. reactions included covert support for the 1964 coup, Super 301 legislation, credit squeezes, etc. However, it has met a formidable foe in Brazilian nationalism, a mature, dynamic force.

Today, despite problems, Brazil shares the growing independence and assertiveness of the rest of the Third World.

Avante Brasil!

Chronicle of Indo-U.S. relations

August 1947: India throws out the British after 200 years of colonial exploitation.

1948: The Nizam (King) of Hyderabad (a landlocked region within India), claims sovereignity from India against the wishes of his people. United States declares the issue to be political, with religious and communal overtones and challenges India's stand in international forums. Even after the accession of Hyderabad to India the United States asserts that in the case of Hyderabad, "the use of force does not alter legal rights."

Dutta/Marathe

1954-55: India requests technological assistance in the setting up of steel plants. United States refuses to be of assistance if the plants are set up as government enterprises (thus shutting out multinational corporations).

April 1955: The non-aligned nations get together in the Bandung Conference in Indonesia. The gathering provides a convenient forum for countering the alliance-forming strategy of the United States and the Soviet Union. U.S. officials try to divest the impact of the conference. Secretary of State Dulles writes to President Eisenhower about the conference, "Our message of greeting to the Afro-Asian conference is in good touch. . .which if properly played, can have excellent propaganda value and to some extent put that conference on the spot."

December 1961: Indian forces throw out the Portuguese from Goa, Daman and Diu (about 1,615 square miles with a population of 685,000), ending 451 years of colonial rule in what was the oldest colony of the world. Adlai Stevenson as head of the U.S. delegation to the United Nations declares that India has committed aggression by the use of force (the parallel to Kuwait is obvious to many — the rhetoric of the New World Order is only a few decades old).

1965-67: The United States supplies wheat to India under the PL-480 program. It is subsequently found that some of the wheat was adulturated with dangerous herbs. It was a sound commercial proposition for the United States but was labelled as "foreign aid."

December 1971: War breaks out between India and Pakistan over the massacre of the Bengalis in East Pakistan being conducted by the army of Pakistan. The American nuclear-powered aircraft carrier Enterprise with a task force of several amphibious ships and destroyers come very close to the Indian territory on the Bay of Bengal to intimidate India. On Dec. 16, the Pakistani army in East Pakistan surrenders. The New York Times reports, "Pak debacle disaster to US prestige."

May 1974: India conducts a nuclear explosion without violating any international obligations. U.S. State Department spokesman remarks, "The United States has always been against nuclear proliferation for the adverse effect it will have on world stability." United States violates its contractual obligations and stops supplying India with fuel for the Tarapur nuclear energy facility.

1974: United States decides to set up a naval base in Diego Garcia, about 1,000 miles away from India, despite India's vigorous protest. U.S. ambassador Moynihan maintains that U.S. interests in the base are more important than those of India (even though the islands are far far away from the United States and very close to India). India protests strongly and describes the U.S. position as "untenable" and "unacceptable."

December 1984: A noxious gas methyl isocyanate escapes from the Union Carbide plant in Bhopal, India causing a chemical holocaust by killing 3,500 and causing permanent injuries to over 200,000 people. Even though Union Carbide was an U.S. corporation the American courts rule that compensatory damages cannot be collected through the U.S. judicial system.

May 1989: India launches its Intermediate Range Ballistic Missile "Agni." The United States is not too happy.

May 1989: India gets cited by the United States for unfair trade practices under Super 301. India had refused to open up its banking and insurance industry to foreign multinationals. India gets threatened with trade barriers. The two countries keep clashing in the international trade talks on trade in services. India's position has consistently been that it would let U.S. insurance agents work in India when the United States allowed Indian carpenters to work in the United States.

May 1991: May the order of mediocrity be awarded to Indians who forget the history of India while in the United States.

Memories from a successful 1990-91 UMass sports year

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

Commentary

One thing's for sure — it sure wasn't boring.

The item in question is the sports year at UMass, 1990-91. It was the year that UMass burst onto the national collegiate sports scene with a flurry of individual and team accomplishments.

First, a few serious notes. UMass lost a friend in Victor Fusia, who coached some of the best football teams in school history during the 1970s. Fusia passed away early this year.

Lorenzo Sutton, who was the all-time scoring leader men's basketball history until being overtaken by Jim McCoy, was knocked into a coma. While walking across campus roads, he was struck by a car in the fall. It was feared that Sutton would never be the same again. Sutton recovered, though, and received a well-deserved standing ovation when he returned to Curry Hicks Cage for a game.

UMass quarterback Gary Wilkos suffered a fractured vertebrae at the base of the neck in the third quarter of a game at Delaware. He was on the field for half an hour as Delaware's rude fans taunted him (fan hint — UMass faces the Blue Hens at home next fall. Be there. Be loud.).

Wilkos was lucky — his injury could have been much worse — but he was fitted with a halo brace, lost to the Minutemen for 1990 and most likely 1991. He, too, has made much progress in recovery and was also awarded a huge ovation at the Cage.

Budget cuts continued to dog the athletic program, as they have the rest of UMass. Spring tennis and women's lacrosse were absent this spring for the first time. Many teams were pressed into doing their own fund-raising.

But ahh, what of the bright side? April Kater was named the best women's college soccer player in the nation in November, receiving the Hermann Trophy, the soccer world's answer to the Heismann.

Kater merely dominated every game she played in, leading UMass to three NCAA Tournaments in four years. Why the Reds were left out this year is a question we're still trying to answer. They were clearly robbed, and Kater was unfairly denied a last shot at an NCAA title. She will be missed. Consider the football team. Coach Jim Reid's crew were undisputed Yankee Conference champions, unbeaten until the last game of the year. They made the Division I-AA Playoffs for the first time since 1988 and saw offensive guard Paul Mayberry make All-American. Reid was Kodak's Coach of the Year for the Northeast region.

Field Hockey was nationally-ranked all season long and lasted into the second round of the NCAA Tournament, where they bowed to Old Dominion. Coach Pam Hixon's squad went 16-6 on the year and continued to dominate New England field hockey. Hixon won her 200th game late in the year.

Speaking of dynasties, the men's swimming team won their fifth consecutive New England Championship this past winter. Can anyone touch these guys? In a word . . . no.

The best, though, is saved for last. Albany, N.Y.'s Knickerbocker Arena. Siena College, up by three with seconds left, stood in the way of a possible NIT final four bid for men's basketball. But Tony Barbee had other ideas. Barbee's turnaround three-pointer drained the net and an overtime later, UMass was in the final four and fans spilled onto the floor.

As Siena's fans turned silent, I listened to the din on the arena floor and felt proud to be from UMass.

mances in his last three starts, capping the year with nine innings of superb relief in the 5-4 loss to Rutgers in Sunday's first game.

One to remember: Junior John Carelli, had a knack of being in the right place at the right time. Against Rutgers in the first meeting of the regular season, Carelli hit a clutch two-out, two- run homer off Phil Schneider, his only one this year, and Rutgers wasn't the same for the rest of the day.

I'll show 'em: Brian Bright was pretty angry at being left off of the A-10 All-Conference teams, and with good reason. He showed everyone in the A-10 Tourney his power with an eighth-inning, game-tying home run against Penn State that led UMass on to win.

Performance of the Year: goes to pitcher Rich Graham. Graham by season's end became the number one starter. Graham's toughness showed during the Temple weekend, as he won the first game on Saturday, throwing six-plus innings, and relieved on Sunday, picking up another win to clinch the tourney berth.

and against Duke (11-10). Loyola also faced Rutgers (17-9) and Delaware (21-8) with success.

UMass has faced those teams with similar results, beating Rutgers 17-11 and smashing Delaware 14-7. Their losses included a season-opener against Cornell (16-7), Brown and Syracuse (13-9).

Sophomore Kevin Beach came on strong at the beginning of the season but has since faded away to the likes of senior Chris Colbeck and junior Jim Blanding. However, Beach still leads the Greyhounds with 25 goals and 23 assists for 48 points. Colbeck leads the team in goals with 37 and Blanding leads with 24 assists.

The Greyhounds have been winning 58 percent of their faceoffs and post a poor 36 percent in man-up situations.

Junior Tim Dunnigan (5-2) finished the season with 79 saves until he broke his collarbone. Sophomore Kevin Anderson stepped in and had three wins to his name but was later arrested on drug trafficking charges. Freshman Andrew Manos, although taking a loss without a win, has 20 saves.

"He looked good against C.W. Post, but the way to beat him is to get a lot of shots on goal," Garber said.

UMass' senior Jim McAleavey and sophomore Mark Millon share the team-high 49 points. Tri-captain McAleavey boasts the team-high assists at 35 while Millon has racked up a team-high 37 goals.

It took Galileo 16 years to master the universe.
You have one night.

It seems unfair. The genius had all that time. While you have a few short hours to learn your sun spots from your satellites before the dreaded astronomy exam.

On the other hand, Vivarin gives you the definite advantage. It helps keep you awake and mentally alert for hours. Safely and conveniently. So even when the subject matter's dull, your mind will stay razor sharp.

If Galileo had used Vivarin, maybe he could have mastered the solar system faster, too.

and against Duke (11-10). Loyola also faced Rutgers (17-9) and Delaware (21-8) with success.

UMass has faced those teams with similar results, beating Rutgers 17-11 and smashing Delaware 14-7. Their losses included a season-opener against Cornell (16-7), Brown and Syracuse (13-9).

Sophomore Kevin Beach came on strong at the beginning of the season but has since faded away to the likes of senior Chris Colbeck and junior Jim Blanding. However, Beach still leads the Greyhounds with 25 goals and 23 assists for 48 points. Colbeck leads the team in goals with 37 and Blanding leads with 24 assists.

The Greyhounds have been winning 58 percent of their faceoffs and post a poor 36 percent in man-up situations.

Junior Tim Dunnigan (5-2) finished the season with 79 saves until he broke his collarbone. Sophomore Kevin Anderson stepped in and had three wins to his name but was later arrested on drug trafficking charges. Freshman Andrew Manos, although taking a loss without a win, has 20 saves.

"He looked good against C.W. Post, but the way to beat him is to get a lot of shots on goal," Garber said.

UMass' senior Jim McAleavey and sophomore Mark Millon share the team-high 49 points. Tri-captain McAleavey boasts the team-high assists at 35 while Millon has racked up a team-high 37 goals.

Senior Jim Kushner (21-7-28), sophomore Mario Guaglianone (16-5-21), senior tri-captain Rich Senatore (11-4-15), junior Mike Cain (9-5-14) and senior Hugh O'Callaghan (9-1-10) have each contributed to 10 or more points.

UMass has an unsteady 28.5 percent success rate during man-up and had recently fallen under .500 in faceoffs.

Senior Ted Kellerman has started each of UMass' 12 games and he boasts 180 saves. He posts a saves average of 64. Junior Ray Suris has made 18 saves and allowed 10 goals in three appearances. Freshman Rip Corenti has allowed two goals and gotten one saves in one game.

Moore dazzles in the supenseful thriller Mortal Thoughts

By MEREDITH O'BRIEN
and SCOTT WEISS
Collegian Staff

Mortal Thoughts tells the tale of how far loyalty to your friends will take you — to commit a murder or to cover it up.

O'BRIEN: While this one was no Fatal Attraction, Mortal Thoughts was suspenseful and captivating. With Demi Moore's compelling portrayal of a woman caught between the law and her best friend's dead husband, she has proves herself as an actress who is ready to tackle any role.

Demi Moore stars as Cynthia Kellogg in Mortal Thoughts.

WEISS: Moore was excellent and, for the most part, portrayed a very believable character. She displayed "compelling" emotions even during the movie's more powerful slow-motion scenes. Although, I have to agree with the theatre attendant at the mall, who said the New York accents were extremely poor and also was the worst part of Moore's character, Cynthia Kellogg. This film took a somewhat different approach, using the flashback technique during Cynthia's interrogation which told the story. With this technique, and good use of foreshadowing, this movie was much better than it probably would have been otherwise.

O'BRIEN: Without dwelling on the accents, which I thought an extremely minor part of the movie, I thought the use of the camera — the zooming in on faces, murder weapon and hands — coupled with the mood-setting music, made this film an experience, not just a fleeting flick. The one thing I though was lacking, though, was a deeper look into Moore's co-conspirator and best friend, Glenne Headly. Headly (Joyce Urbanski), appearing neurotic and ditzy, did not really come alive off the screen like Moore did. Likewise for Headly's brutal husband, played by Moore's real-life husband Bruce Willis (James Urbanski).

WEISS: This movie did focus primarily on Moore's character without doing much with the other characters. Going into the movie, I certainly expected a bigger part to be played by Bruce Willis. Anyway, this movie kept me entertained although I don't think it went far enough. They could have done more with it. One of the detectives conducting Cynthia's interview provided a good source of differing opinions, but was a little extreme in his actions and at times blatantly rude to Cynthia (Moore), who volunteered to be there.

O'BRIEN: To put a little background on this, Headly's husband was murdered. The beginning of the film is set in a police interrogation room where Moore began to tell the story of her own involvement with Willis' death. Moore, who had grown up and worked with Headly, reluctantly told the police the sordid story of Headly and Willis' violent marriage. It is through her emotional story telling that the film got its intensity.

WEISS: Oh sure, give the whole story away. Why don't you tell them all about the giant doughnut-eating toad that terrorizes Demi Moore in an attempt to mate?. . . As a whole, this movie was intriguing and has an interesting ending that leaves you wondering about the entire movie, including why Cynthia and Joyce (Headly) did what they did. There was, however, a lack of clear motivation for some of the character's actions and the ending only leaves you questioning them even more.

O'BRIEN: I don't think the character motivations were unclear at all, in fact, I think the plot was uncomfortably crystal clear at the end. This was a great Hitchcock-type mystery that will puzzle you and leave you puzzling long after the movie. Even if you don't like mysteries, go to see Demi Moore, she was great. Thumbs up.

WEISS: How can this movie be "crystal clear" and at the same time "leave you puzzling"? Even I know that is contradictory, I would think that you, with your "great" journalism experience, would be able to see that. However, the idea of leaving you puzzled is a fresh approach in today's movie market glut. I recommend this movie for a change of pace. Thumbs up.

Did you ever plan to do something at the beginning of a semester and end up putting it off for so long that by the time you actually got around to doing it, it's too late? That almost happened with me and writing record reviews. Almost.

Norton Records has recently issued a bevy of fine waxings.

The A-Bones serve up "Button Nose" from their latest LP The Life of Riley, backed with a not-available-on-the-album gem "I'm Snowed." Both the single and the album offer an update on the basic Bo Diddley/"Road Runner" riffs, with more attitude, humor, and reckless abandon than all the mega-tons of records AC/DC ever sold (with all due respect to AC/DC of course). The A-Bones also graciously back up The Great Gaylord, the sultan of squat, for his single "Squat with Me Baby"/"Do de squat." This R&B shouter will have 'em squattin' in the aisles in no time.

The Legendary Stardust Cowboy, who in the past has fondled our eustachian tubes with musical delights such as "Standing in a Trash Can Thinking About You" comes at us with the rock-a-billy ditties "I Ride A Tractor"/"Relaxation." The Ledge S.C. is way out there, and if you aren't when the record starts, you will be once it's over, or at least further than before.

The last of Norton's seven inches is an EP of incredibly rare, yet kickin' rock-a-billy by Elroy Dietzel. This is Elroy features three sides from two singles he released in 1956 on the Bo-Kay label in Texas.

From the same epoch as Elroy comes the latest installation of the kooky kompilation The Big Itch (Vol. 3) on Mr. Manicotti. These comps showcase timeless obscurities from the late 50s-early 60s as the Three D's "Graveyard Cha-Cha," Rex Johnson's "Discombobulated," or Glenn & Christy's "Wombat Twist." Play it loud and some humorless soul is sure to despise you.

Thumbs up to the latest from Fishbone, The Reality of My Surroundings. I had high hopes for this after seeing their Ballroom show and was not disappointed. Highlights include "Everyday Sunshine," "Fight the Youth," and "Prayer to the Junkiemaker." Another thumbs up for Motorhead's 1916. Although there are a few weak cuts (the title track, "Angel City"), the good ones ("The One to Sing the Blues", "I'm so Bad," "Nightmare") more than make up for it. Also check out No Remorse (best of) and their other reissued back catalog on Road Racer Revisited.

There you have it — check these out and enjoy them. I hope to be writing more next semester. Until then have a delicious and nutritious summer.

Don't study, vestry instead

By RORY EVANS
Collegian Staff

Do not read on Reading Day.

Leave your texts to collect dust for just one night.

Make the pilgrimage to Noho, because for less than the price of two 40 ounce bottles of malt liquor, you can see the Vestrymen at Pearl Street on Thursday night.

The show is a record release party, celebrating the imminent release of their four-song, seven-inch EP on Absolute Agogo. The disc includes a version of Alex Chilton's "Kangaroo," a classic show-closer.

Chris Weinberg, the Vestrydrummer, said now is the time to see the Vestrymen. "We've done plenty since last year's record release of The Vestrymen. We toured last summer, and we're planning on doing the same this summer. Like most students finishing up their schoolwork, we're ready to leave for the summer and Thursday's show is like our final exam."

"Other than our own disc being released, 'The Chromatic Girl'" will be on the Jamadisc Valley Artists compilation," he said.

Weinberg said "the doors of perception" at Pearl Street or at 8:30 p.m. The Gigolo Aunts will be opening, and according to Weinberg, this Boston-based band has been drawing crowds in our state's capital.

"For any one concerned that if they see the Vestrymen on Thursday, they won't be able to see Dino Jr. on Friday, those fears are unfounded. Our price is right. We promise a good show. People should come," Weinberg said.

So shut the books for a bit.

All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy.

The Vestrymen will play Pearl Street on Thursday night. Doors open at 8:30 p.m.

Motorhead will be on Letterman Thursday night. Don't miss it!

Thoughts from Allentown

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

Roadtripping is eventually part of covering a sports team. Besides having great meals and a great bed at the Hilton, my trip with the University of Massachusetts softball team to the Atlantic 10 Championships in Allentown, Pa. was a memorable one.

There were many stories and people who made it a great time, but Ed Hamilton had to be Number One. Ed is the Assistant Director of Communications in charge of working with the media from the A-10 office. He is also a man of a thousand quotes, so it's easy to say that he's good at getting along with people.

Commentary

The staff at Patriots Park in Allentown was of particular amusement to us. Our personal favorite was the scoreboard operator, Kyle, otherwise known as the human 'it.' When I first saw the 4-foot-4 person, I thought I was a little girl. When Rick Seto first saw him, he thought he was a little boy. Ed classified him as homo erectus on the human evolutionary scale. It turns out he was about 35.

He was certainly not your normal kind of guy. Before the UMass-Rutgers game on Saturday, there was glare off a windshield from a car in centerfield. Well, it was Kyle to the rescue as he "teleported" there in about two seconds. Carl Lewis couldn't have made it any faster.

At one point, Ed pointed to the 4-foot-4 balding Kyle and cracked, "The reason I'm against nuclear power is right there. Was Three Mile Island around here?!"

Then there was the bet. Team manager Ellen Sullivan bet head coach Elaine Sortino that a certain four-letter word could not be uttered by the coach during the entire tournament. To the surprise of no one, it took until the third inning of the first game against Temple for Sullivan to take the victory.

Sullivan later in the weekend was responsible for a small fire in a local laundromat when washing the team's uniforms before the second Rutgers game. Fortunately there were no injuries reported.

At the Conference's season-ending awards luncheon, the energetic mayor of Allentown, Joseph DiNanno, stole the show. Always the politician, the mayor assured us that his downtown stores would gladly accept all cash and credit cards. As Ed remarked, "He should be selling Ginsu knives on late night TV."

A classic remark from DiNanno, who was bragging about his town's replica of the Liberty Bell was: "I think our bell is better than Philadelphia's because their's has a crack in it."

Even before Allentown, there was the pizza scandal. Through a mixup, there were 10-pizzas ordered — twice. Everyone traveling with the squad was allowed to take a taste test and decide which was better, Andy's or Bruno's. My vote was for Bruno's while Rick favored Andy's. Needless to say the pizza-per-person ratio proved to be too much, and 12 pizzas traveled south with us. Opening her remarks at the luncheon, Coach Sortino joked, "We're hoping to get a peddlers' license to sell the leftover pizzas to make up for budget cuts."

One highlight was definately the Patriot Park concession stand, which supplied our contingent with a few good meals at extremely reasonable prices.

One lowlight was the fact that acquiring beer (yes, Collegian people do drink) is nearly impossible in Allentown. The closest place to the Hilton, which is in the center of town, was five miles away. Everything closes at 6 p.m. on Saturday night — not exactly a college town. The city motto should be "Welcome to Allentown, B.Y.O.B." Unfortunately we didn't.

But what made this road trip a truly great time was the team. Rick or I were never made to feel excluded out of anything the team did. We couldn't have asked for better treatment from a team, and that made it a very enjoyable weekend.

And if the Minutewomen make it to the College World Series at Oklahoma City . . .

Staff member Rick Seto contributed to this most sarcastic and ridiculous column

Hmmm.
Can't quite put my finger on it. Plenty of sleep... plenty of night life... Just not enough...
Classes?
That was it.

Tune in next semester for more conflicting roommates, tangelos, Fish, lots more Librarians, lots more sex, and hopefully lots more librarians having sex.
Until then: Carpe Diem, dudes. Party onwards and upwards. And shake it one time for the elderly.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Complications could arise on the home front. Someone asks a special favor you cannot grant. Stick to your guns; a matter of principle is involved. But if they offer a lot of money, screw principles.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Show your vulnerability to a child and a new understanding will develop. Stay away from a lingering love who will not make a commitment. A reunion pleases you enormously. Use lots of condoms.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): A romantic relationship would benefit from greater give-and-take. Get ready to compromise with your mate. Athletic activities help disperse nervous energy. Cut your hair. Get a job.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Home improvement projects may be high on your list of priorities. Try not to tackle too many things at once. A late afternoon phone call brings you new hope about a financial matter. Stay away from guys in alleys named Joe.

LEO (July 23-Aug 22): Resolve to put some distance between yourself and problems from the past. Give greater thought to your future career needs. A friend or relative tries to set you up on a blind date. Don't do it.

VIRGO (Aug 23-Sept 22): A long sought career goal comes to pass, thanks to the help of an influential person. Put your worries behind you. And for God's sake, don't read the horoscopes. They are a crock.

LIBRA (Sept 23-Oct 22): Plans and relationships will flourish beautifully now. A job opportunity and the promise of prestige spark your interest. Be nice to a Taurus today. A newcomer's arrival is prophetic.

SCORPIO (Oct 23-Nov 21): The morning is highlighted by unusual events and forward-looking people. You feel a strong need for privacy and introspection this afternoon. You can throw those bellbottoms in the trash now.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov 22-Dec 21): Family members can influence a business or educational choice. Everyone is out to get you. The support you give will be reciprocated threefold. Romance is fine – and so is your lover's hair.

CAPRICORN (Dec 22-Jan 19): An excellent day to approach higherups about an innovative per project. Other people are anxious to hear what you have to say. They need a good laugh. Nod your head and smile a lot.

AQUARIUS (Jan 20-Feb 18): A financial change could catch you off-guard unless you plan ahead. A willingness to accept high-tech equipment will put your career back on the fast track. A little brown-nosing wouldn't hurt, either.

PISCES (Feb 19-March 20): Keep your relationships low-key. Anxiety and guilt can affect your health. If you issue ultimatums, romance will fly out the window. Annoy your friends, wear your heart on your sleeve!

FOR THOSE OF you who attended the Spring Zing in Sunderland on May 4, thank you for your donations. We were able to donate $2800 to the Nancy S. Anton Memorial Scholarship Fund. We'd like to thank all of the bands: Second Line, Please, Dangerous Papers, A New Machine, The Sauce, Fish Tales and the Sly Trombones, and Minibus Sandwich. Whoever stole the guitar from Minibus Sandwich, money had to be taken out of the scholarship fund to replace it. Call 665-2617 or 665-3754 if you have any information concerning the stolen guitar. That was pretty cheesy.

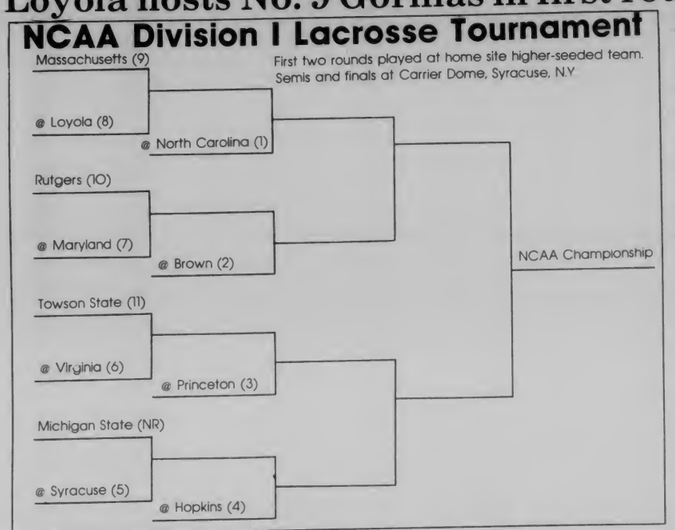
Loyola hosts No. 9 Gorillas in first round of NCAA play



By ADRIEN MATT
Collegian Staff

Wednesday's here again and postseason play for the University of Massachusetts lacrosse team has been determined.

Loyola College will host UMass in Baltimore, Md., for the first round of the NCAA Playoffs, and the winner plays No. 1 North Carolina.

What you see to the left is the result of hard work and brain power of coaches and athletic directors across the country who comprise the NCAA Selection Committee.

UMass coach Ted Garber said he is pleased with the seedings. The first-year coach from New Hampshire has had success against Loyola, unlike his father, Dick, who retired last year. The younger Garber has a 3-0 record against the Greyhounds from Baltimore.

The clubs haven't faced off since 1988. UMass dropped their season-opener 14-5 in Baltimore on AstroTurf. Loyola came into the game ranked No. 4 with five games tucked under their belts, while UMass checked in as the obvious underdogs.

The eighth-ranked Greyhounds, who recently bashed C.W. Post 10-4 in their final effort of the regular season, have a 8-3 record.

The No. 9 Gorillas who finished their regular season with a 13-9 loss to Syracuse May 4, end with one win better at 9-3.

The only common experience the Greyhounds and Gorillas have in common in a one-point homefield loss to Brown in the regular season. Loyola lost 14-13 while UMass fell 13-12 in overtime. UMass is 2-for-3 in overtime play but all Loyola games have been decided in regulation.

Other Greyhound losses have been at Virginia (17-10)

Postseason begins for UM Softball

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

This weekend, while many students turn their attention to finals, graduations and good-byes, the members of the University of Massachusetts softball team will have only one thing on their minds; the NCAA Tournament.

On Saturday and Sunday, No. 18 Massachusetts (38-11) will host No. 5 Nevada-Las Vegas (47-15-1) and No. 20 Connecticut (35-16-1) in the first round of the NCAA Championship Tournament.

Saturday will see UMass and UConn battle at noon, the loser will meet UNLV at 2 p.m. and the winner will take on the Lady Rebels at 4 p.m.

The double-elimination tournament continues Sunday, the remaining teams, with one loss or less, will play at 1 p.m. and 3 p.m. if necessary. All games will be played on Totman Field. The winner of the regional will advance to the College World Series to be played in Oklahoma City, May 22-26.

"This is what we have worked all year for," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said. "Now we want to take it one step further and make it to the big show, the biggest show in town."

"This is everyone's goal when you start the season and we are happy to realize that goal." UConn coach Karen Mullins said.

"This is what it is all about in collegiate softball," UNLV assistant coach Brian Kolze. "We made it to the World Series last season and we want to do again, of course UConn and UMass also do, so the games will be great."

Connecticut and Massachusetts don't need to be introduced. The two teams will meet up for the sixth time this season. UConn holds the edge so far 3-2 but UMass has won the last two games.

"I figured the two of us would battle it out in the postseason," Mullins said. "UMass is exciting to play because of the great regional rivalry, we know what to expect from them."

Connecticut's championship hopes ride on the arms on pitchers Kim Mizesko (20-9, 0.41 ERA) and Pat Conlan (15-5 1.07 ERA). Mizesko has beaten UMass twice this season including a

"Yesterday's just a memory."

That said, we now look back on the University of Massachusetts baseball team's best and worst memories of the year.

The Minutemen's season started in Florida during Spring Break, and it was anything but a vacation for the players. The team lost their first six games of the year, including a 19-0 pounding by South Florida to open the season.

Back 'up north,' UMass played their first Atlantic 10 opponents of the year, Rhode Island, and won 3-of-4 games. At this point, things looked to be on the way up.

Unfortunately, UMass lost their next five games in a row, and things might never have improved, if it wasn't for Lou Olivieri's grand slam against Dartmouth.

After the 12-6 Dartmouth win, UMass won 15 of their next 21 games. This was the most consistent stretch of UMass' season, featuring many great individual performances and moments.

Up the Middle: The quartet of catcher Derek Dana, second baseman Steve Corradi, shortstop Glenn DiSarcina and centerfielder Mike Tobin were absolutely indispensible to the team this year. Dana's game-calling and hitting, DiSarcina's smooth defense, Corradi's bat and Tobin's swiftness afield were all cornerstones to UMass' success.

Move over, Bo: Ron Villone, a two-sport athlete, steps onto the mound at Rhode Island in three consecutive games. He wins two games and saves another as the Minutemen move out to a quick 3-1 Atlantic 10 lead.

Villone was named to the A-10 All-Conference team at season's end and finished with a 4-2 record with 4 saves and a 4.28 ERA.

"JayBird" ruffles Owls' feathers: Jay Dodig made the most of a second chance versus Temple. When an apparent third strike was ruled a foul tip much to the Owls' chagrin, Dodig cranked a game-winning three-run homer well over the left-field fence, giving UMass a 4-1 win.

"He was a good captain." Co-captain Torres proved his mettle with a game-tying home run in the first Championship game with Rutgers at the A-10 Tourney. Although the Minutemen lost in 10 innings, Torres led by example and put UMass in a position to win.

From Lunenberg to Boyertown: After a horrendous Florida trip, sophomore Jeff Toothaker rebounded with fine perfor-

UMass provost gets chancellorship

By MARC ELLIOTT
Collegian Staff

Provost Richard O'Brien was appointed by the University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees on May 15 to a two-year interim term as chancellor of the Amherst campus, replacing President-Chancellor Joseph Duffey.

Duffey, who is leaving after eight years as chancellor and one year in a dual role as president of the UMass campuses in Boston, Amherst, and Worcester, accepted last March the presidency of American University in Washington, D.C. Duffey joins his wife, Anne Wexler, who is a lobbyist in the city.

In a press conference a few hours after he was named interim chancellor for the next two years, Provost Richard D. O'Brien warned the campus community at the end of last semester that hard choices must be made in the near future to ensure the University's survival.

"I believe that in a University uncertainty is sometimes a lot worse than budgetary shortfalls and I hope to make a series of decisions over the next few weeks which will not necessarily be enjoyed by everybody but that I think are necessary to give assurance that we know where we're going and we know what we're going to preserve," O'Brien said.

O'Brien said that should University's budget be reduced by a large margin, the administration will cut allocations to some colleges by a large amount while other colleges will be unaffected.

"Certain areas are not appropriate to cut and others will take very large cuts," he said.

O'Brien did not specify which colleges were in danger.

O'Brien also said some departments could conceivably be eliminated, but said he would leave those sorts of decisions to the college deans after the administration divides the cuts among them.

Saying his first order of business is to fight the "savage cuts" being proposed by the Weld administration, O'Brien said that his argument is "a simple economic one."

"The future of this state, more than any other state, depends on a highly educated workforce," he said. "We don't have great mineral deposits. We don't have a great deal of agriculture. We have smart people and we need educated people."

While acknowledging the "excellent" education in Massachusetts private universities, O'Brien said, most of the state's educated labor force are educated in the public system.

O'Brien said he does not plan to be a candidate for the permanent chancellor, but said he would consider the post if the circumstances change "wildly."

"If the circumstances do change and if in two years time things are wildly different and I am a fantastic success and the trustees beg on their knees to be allowed to break their ruling [that prevents him from consideration], I shall listen thoughtfully and give it the proper attention," he said.

O'Brien has been provost and executive vice chancellor since 1984 and was provost and professor of biology at the University of Rochester for six years before that.

He was a faculty member at Cornell University from 1960 to 1978 and received his doctorate in chemistry from the University of Western Ontario, Canada in 1954.

O'Brien acquired his accent from his birthplace in England and became a U.S. resident in 1966. He now lives in Amherst.

Everywoman's Center survives cuts, hard times

By RUA KELLY
Collegian Staff

The Everywoman's Center has been one of the University's most prominent accomplishments, as one of the largest rape crisis, counseling and referral centers in the country.

It was founded in the early 1970s, but since 1988 the EWC has struggled against a declining budget and waning support from the administration.

A $444,000 cut in the Student Affairs budget in the fall of 1990 served to force the EWC to its knees.

Two positions were slashed by then Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis Madson in an attempt to balance his budget — transferring the Outreach Coordinator and the head of the Counseling Program to other areas.

This meant the disintegration of numerous support groups on topics such as eating disorders and "coming out" issues for lesbians and bisexuals, as well as the end of walk-in counseling for women.

Madson's decision was the final blow for students who had seen the Center lose 66 percent of its direct services in three years.

Rallies, meetings and vigils followed, and hundreds of students demonstrated their anger with the administrator's decision.

"It's very easy for these people within the administration with their comfortable lifestyles to dismiss this [the Everywoman's Center]," said UMass senior Kathy Lemay. "It's not so easy for those who have to suffer alone in our rooms."

The administration remained adamant about the permanancy of the cuts through the semester.

Dean of Students Jo-Anne Vanin explained, "It is the intention of Madson, as well as myself, to maintain direct services. We have valves, but outside forces are infringing on those valves."

While students were frustrated by the administration's position, particularly in a time of fiscal crisis when tensions were high and violence on the rise, the story had a somewhat happy ending.

Collegian Staff Report

Preston P. Forman, Chris Muther and Sondra Sutton contributed to this article.

Welcome to the University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

While the college experience has become the cliche of choice among high school English teachers ("You'll explore new ideas, feelings. . . and study things you never knew existed, blah, blah, blah,") they are very much correct. High schools might offer physics, few offer nuclear physics. Perhaps it's a matter of scale.

Here at the UMass, a lot a things relate to scale. Along with the largest brick structure in the country (the Tower Library — that monstrosity by the Campus Pond), UMass holds the title for the largest college daily newspaper in New England as well as the largest all-student run production company in the country, the Union Program Council.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian publishes more than 19,000 copies every school day and distributes it not only at the University but throughout the Five-College Area.

The paper employs 175 students in a variety of occupations — advertising representatives, reporters, editors, paste-up personnel, photographers, graphic coordinators and circulation personnel. The Collegian, like all Registered Student Organizations, is open to anyone at the University — one doesn't have to be a journalism major to work in the newsroom or be a business major to sell ads.

The paper focuses mainly on campus news and issues but also carries state, national and international Associated Press wire stories. Many of our graduates continue on to work at newspapers such as the local Hampshire Daily Gazette, Springfield Union-News

Doctor hands out smart sex advice

"You can't make me blush," says Dr. Abel

By MORGAN BRITTON
Collegian Staff

"You can't make me blush," said Dr. Jim Abel of University Health Services at a Just Say Know workshop on sex education and birth control. "I challenge you to do so. Anybody who makes me blush gets a dozen condoms or the spermicide of their choice — or both."

"Tonight we're going to talk about sex," explains Abel to a group of about 45 students sitting on couches, tables and the floor of a Patterson lounge. "We're here to talk about sexual things, not moral issues. Whether it's right or wrong good or bad. You'll have to decide for yourself. We're just going to talk about sex."

For almost three hours Abel stands in front of a table filled with over two dozen condoms of different brands, sizes, textures and flavors, spermicides, lubricants and gels in more than 10 varieties, diaphragms ranging in sizes and piles of pamphlets on sexually transmitted diseases and birth control.

Before beginning his discussion, Abel passes out slips of paper for students to write down questions they would like answered, if they are too embarrassed to ask them aloud. Skimming through the pile of questions, he said, "looking through these questions I can tell that 90 percent of them have to do with orgasms."

Sexual behavior and attitudes among University of Massachusetts students are not much different from other college-age students in the United States, Abel said.

According to a recent study of 16,861 students at colleges nationwide, including UMass, 1,500 students carry the HIV virus. Unwanted pregnancies and sexually transmitted diseases are prevalent, Abel said.

Through workshops, programs and counselling, students are made more aware of the options available and the precautions they can take, he said. While these attempts have been successful in increasing awareness, problems in properly using contraception and prophylactics still remain, he said.

In 1985, University Health Services treated 844 patients for sexually transmitted diseases, according to a UHS fact sheet. In 1990, 2135 students were treated. Veneral warts and chlamydia diagnoses have both doubled while cases of gonorrhea have decreased by almost 75 percent, the fact sheet stated.

and the Greenfield Recorder as well as large papers such as the Boston Globe, Miami Herald and the Los Angeles Times.

For those with a political axe to grind, the Student Government Association is an excellent place to dip the toes into student issues. There are several branches of student government ranging from the House Councils, which oversee individual residence halls, to Area Governments, to the campus wide, Undergraduate Student Senate, which controls and distributes $2 million a year in Student Activity Trust Fund.

A University student also serves on the University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees as a full voting member. The election for this office, which usually draws many aspirants, is held in the spring.

The SGA underwent last spring a revolution of sorts. Several members of the SGA, in a bid to improve the efficiency of the often bogged-down Senate, asked the administration to restructure the Senate. A referendum on the new system went down in flames, however, and its status up in the air at press time.

There are several organizations on campus for members of the gay community as well. The Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay Alliance sponsors many events each semester including a weekly coffee social and monthly dances. They also have an office in the Student Union were students can study, talk or just hang out.

The Program for Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual concerns located in Crampton in Southwest also has open study space in addition to a large library of gay books and periodicals.

For students needing help with problems of "coming out" or adjusting to gay life, there is the LBG Counseling Collective, which offers free, walk-in, peer counseling and emergency referrals. The collective is also looking for volunteers for the fall semester. Look for details this fall.

The Black Mass Communications Project, is one of the largest Black organizations at the University. The members of BMCP put together various functions as well as benefits for the people of color in the surrounding community.

Some of these events are the annual Funk-O-Thon, and jeans and t-shirt parties, as well as many informational and motivational lectures and open forums.

BMCP is also incorporated with WMUA 91.1 FM radio station by filling 36 hours of Urban Contemporary music, with their disc jockeys "The BMCP All-Stars."

Started in 1971, BMCP has been recognized as one of the most productive organizations on campus.

The project offers membership to all who are interested. To become a member or for information about the project and becomming a DJ call (413) 545-2426 or contact the music director, Kenley Obas (617) 361-2455, or the Black Affairs Editor, Sondra Sutton (413) 783-3831.

■ smart sex

A short man with a big grin hidden behind a gray beard, Abel bounces in front of his audience. He uses diagrams, props and sometimes unexpectedly calls on viewers to answer questions. He said he wants students to be able to ask him anything they want about sex.

Drawing both male and female genitals on a large piece of paper, he tells the audience, "We're going to have an orgasm both as a man and a woman."

He then takes the group through the phases of an orgasm, visually pointing at the diagrams and the sensitive areas of the body at each point leading through the orgasm. At the same time, he is charting a graph of pleasure at each of the stages, both for male and female. Occasionally he asks the audience what to do next. "You're a bunch of amateurs," he said, when no response is heard, "It's a shame I have to teach you these things."

Abel conducts Just Say Know as an informal type of workshop in an atmosphere where students are made to feel comfortable asking questions. He encourages his audience to ask questions in their own words.

"When I was your age I used to talk like you," he says, then quickly blurts out a list of words, "tits and balls and penis and pussy and fuck and score and scoop," while the somewhat surprised audience look around at others respond before they laugh and giggle.

Abel said his goal is to be able to have students be able to feel comfortable talking about sex, "I'm old but I am not that old." He said he wants students to realize that he understands their sexual behavior.

"It was like deja vu," he said. "I saw they're still making the same mistakes I made. I don't find it hard to relate to them sexually."

Abel offers his views and advice on sex, birth control and prevention of sexually transmitted diseases. His goal is to teach "smart sex," not "safe sex," which he calls "a bunch of buzzwords, pretty posters and practical advice which doesn't work." While smart sex is, "Just say know. Know what the hell you're talking about. Know what you're doing and know how to do it."

Abel starts to discuss what he feels is most important, "We'll talk about contraceptives and prophylactics which prevent diseases. I have some condoms here that you're going to steal and you'll probably take every one of them. Smart sex means being aware of the choices of contraceptives and prophylactics available and how to use them properly. Contraception alone does not prevent diseases."

He begins with discussing condoms. "If you are sexually-active gentlemen and carry condoms, I urge you to carry spermicides or you are only half a man." He warns his audience condoms are frequently used improperly. If put on incorrectly, they can easily rip or tear. The detergents in spermicides provide extra protection both against disease and pregnancy.

He extended his thumb and said, "probably the smallest penis in the room." He put the condom on his thumb to demonstrate the proper way to use a condom on. Despite the fact that many men may complain about how condoms fit or feel, Abel says they can fit any shape or size penis. As he stretches a condom, arms outstretched over twelve inches, he disputes the argument that condoms "are not long enough" blowing up a condom he disproves the claim of "it's not wide enough."

"Condoms are fun, they're awesome," he said, "They come in over 250 kinds." In order to find out which you like best Abel suggests "practice." He also urges use of condoms during oral sex. As he randomly rips open condom packages sticking them in his mouth to taste, sometimes as if eating a piece of chewing gum, he spits out the ones with unpleasant flavor and warns "all Lifestyle condoms taste awful. Sheik Elite mint flavor are the best." Most of the audience laughs, while a few sit staring, somewhat shocked. "What's so terrible about putting condoms in your mouth? You played with balloons when you were little."

Cults warned against

Former members tell of experiences

By LISA VESHECCO
Collegian Correspondent

Lisa, a junior at the University of Massachusetts, who asked that her last name not be used, was walking to class when she was approached by another young women.

After a brief few minutes of conversation the question was asked by the young women that Lisa said she later became uncomfortable with.

"Do you wanna go to bible study class in Crampton?" Lisa's response was "what kind of bible study?" because she said she was curious.

Lisa said she was upset to hear it was Christian. Most people do not think of cults as being Christian, but rather make the assumption that a cult is associated with satanic worship or ritual.

One of the organizers involved with bringing speakers from a FOCUS, a cult awareness, information, and support group to the UMass campus a few weeks ago commented on the fact students she spoke with were afraid to attend the lecture thinking it was equated with satanic practices.

Lisa received phone calls for the next six days from her "new friend" who was very persistent in her attempts to get together with Lisa for attending church or bible study together in the near future.

Finally, Lisa said she had to ask her roommate to intercept the calls by responding Lisa was not at home.

Some suggestions offered by facilitators of FOCUS as general guidelines for distinguishing the difference, she said. A religion will teach an allegience to a god while cults will teach allegiance to a leader of the group.

While religions usually allow for a person to integrate with society in general a religion will teach an allegience to a god while cults will teach allegiance to a leader of the group.

While religions usually allow for a person to integrate with society in general a cult will encourage this for recruiting purposes only, she said. Cults will attempt to discourage association with friends and family, she said.

Former cult member Lee Ann Pellegrini recalls throughout her "indoctrination process" where a cult works to change one's belief system, she was taught to view herself as one of "God's chosen people." A belief she says came to be an incredible burden as well as a self-rightous position.

"I came to seperate myself from the world," states Pellegrini because she was now to assume the responsibility of saving the world.

An additional factor to consider, she said, is the idea religions will usually allow for some degree of autonomy and critical thinking amongst its participants.

She said cults discourage critical thinking in any way, shape, and form and will rely on various 'thought stopping' techniques to interrupt the process.

In the case of Pellegrini, a former cult member of the The Way International Bible Research and Teaching Ministry, cult techniques gained control of her mind and kept her "locked" for 10 years.

According to Pellegrini, "the purpose of thought stopping techniques is to get one into a blissful state." Anytime Pellegrini experienced a human thought or emotion she was conditioned to interrupt the process by either chanting, speaking in tongues, meditation, or reciting the "word of God."

In last week's Time Magazine, it was reported Noah Lottick, a 24-year-old Russian Studies major jumped 10 stories to his death clutching $171 dollars. It is stated the money was the only money not "yet" turned over to The Church of Scientology, a group Lottick has joined just seven months earlier. (May.6, 1991)

Campus feminists organize for education, advocacy

By KATHERINE T. LAMOTHE
Collegian Staff

At a time when feminists across the country are working together on issues such as violence against women and reproductive rights, one group at the University of Massachusetts is working to organize students on these and other issues.

For the past two years, the UMass Progressive Organization for Women's Rights has tried to educate students about issues for women, including violence against women and reproductive rights, POWER Co-President Meagan Rosser said.

Such education, she said, included films and lectures as part of Violence Against Women Awareness Week. In addition, POWER, along with student groups from Smith and Amherst colleges, worked with the National Abortion Rights Action League during the primary campaign for the First Congressional District seat in distributing information on each candidate's stand on abortion.

During the Persian Gulf War, Rosser said, the group also worked on the issues involving women and the war. Besides discussing women in combat, she added, "we were also looking at how money is needed to fund domestic programs."

Besides education, Rosser said, the group has also been involved in community activism, such as participating in last semester's protests over budget cuts to the Everywoman's Center, as well as helping to organize contingents to pro-choice marches in Boston and Washington, D.C.

Although Rosser is co-president of POWER, she said she and the other officers do not set the agenda for what issues the group will address, but that every member can contribute their own ideas.

"The organization is much more collectively run," she said. "We work on a consensus basis." She also said while there are some members who attend all the meetings, there are others who have joined to work on specific issues.

Not all of POWER's work is political, however, Rosser said. She said she hopes to sponsor more social events, as the group had this past semester with events such as a benefit concert for Necessities/Necesidades, a shelter for battered women located in Northampton, and a woman's dance, held as part of "Strong Gay Days."

"I like to have more dances, because (they're) fun and raise money," she said. "I want to have a social organization, not just a political one."

She also said the group is open to everyone, especially women of color, and that she hopes to continue to work with other groups, such as the Third World Caucus and the Lesbian Bisexual Gay Alliance, on issues such as those of women of color and lesbians.

"We're trying to do more coalition-building and outreach," Rosser said. "We'd welcome more women of color in POWER."

Daring you to be different

Dear New Students and class of 1995,

So you've arrived on the campus of the largest public University in New England for a few days of tests, schedules, workshops, oh-so-yummy Dining Commons food and 300 or so people you've never met before. Come September, there will be more tests and schedules — and 25,000 others who are both just like you and nothing like you at the same time.

In short, it's a golden opportunity.

Greg Sukiennik

Now this isn't meant to be a lecture — you've heard enough lectures to last two lifetimes if your experience is anything like mine. But, if I had to describe UMass in one word, that word would be eclectic. The size of this University and the diversity of people and opinions within it is kind of like one big educational smorgasbord. To really appreciate it, my advice would be to try as many different things as possible.

It's all your decision. Take a class in something you've never tried before, like Philosophy or Afro-American Studies. Listen to what your neighbors and classmates have to say about various topics. You'll never know what these different ideas are like until you experience and understand them. You also may find yourself bored stiff if you stick to stuff you're familiar with.

Which leads me to the purpose of this little spiel. Indeed, all that talk about trying different things, about being different, has a lot in common with this page you're reading now — the Editorial/Opinion page.

It's that differentness that the Ed/Op page is looking to capture this semester in the black and white, smudgy pages of the Collegian. Often, this page has in the past been bogged down with opinions on the same subjects — we're hoping that the coming semester will bring a wider variety of discussion on a broader range of topics.

Let's face it, everybody has an opinion about something. It could be a pressing issue like civil rights or world politics. It could be a diatribe against the Dining Commons for not carrying Fruit Loops. (Sorry, Toucan Sam fans. The Munchy Stores on campus, however, do carry Fruit Loops. Don't panic.)

But whatever you think, chances are it bears some importance to somebody somewhere on this campus. And wouldn't it be great to share these opinions with 25,000 people? Even better, how about making people, dare I say it, think?

That's what this page is here for. So you don't like how the Administration is running things? Write about it. You're pissed off about how you or your friends are being treated by Housing, or the UMass Police, or your professors? No one will know unless you speak up. Does something strike you as funny or ridiculous? Tell us. Without submissions, this page would look pretty blank.

Words have power well beyond any other weapon or invention. Improperly used, words can hurt, but they can also compliment, accuse, persuade, provoke, or praise. This page has the potential to do all those things and more because it is your words which can achieve those ends. All you have to do is write.

Above all, don't be afraid to take advantage of your right to your own ideas, opinions and thoughts. They brought you to this place, and when it comes down to it, only they can get you out.

Columnist solves mysteries of UMass on her own tour

Let me begin by dispelling that nasty rumor going around that UMass students are helpful people: Don't ever ask them for directions, especially during the first week of school when you know absolutely nothing about the demographics of this vast campus.

Now, I don't won't feel too guilty offering to lead you through this labyrinth of a campus. Sure, it feels like the blind leading the blind, but who's gonna know?

I will be embarking on my senior year in September, and I could not name any building beyond the Campus Center Garage if my life depended on it. By the way, the Garage is that strange-looking edifice smack in the middle of campus that's trying to look like a real building. If you figure out what it reminds you of, give me a call.

I still haven't figured out where the Campus Center ends and the Student Union Building begins, but they're there. In any case, they are probably the most frequently visited places on this campus. Go through the Campus Center concourse and watch hawkers try to sell their wares — everything from roses to magic potions and fancy computers you can't afford.

Then, if you're really bored, go to the Blue Wall. I don't know whose idea it was to crush some concrete and put it up in the middle of a coffee shop for decoration, but that's diversity for ya. If you're a coffee connoisseur (at least, you will be after cramming for exams and papers for four years), it will feel somewhat like heaven.

If you can't stand anything that's not submerged in grease and fat, however, go for a stroll to the Hatch (another diversity thing so don't ask me how they got that name) and order anything on the menu.

The University Store can get boring, too, once you've memorized all the greeting cards, but give it a try for the first few weeks. Or, at least, space out your visits so you don't get overwhelmed. Beware of people browsing in the magazine section. They can stand there forever.

A. R. Santiago

Avoid the TextBook Annex until you really have to get your books. It is not for the weak-hearted. I once read a whole book while waiting in line, creasing the pages with my sweat and listening to the most inane conversations. If you like to eavesdrop, like me, however, go for it. Maybe you can become a columnist for the Collegian, which, by the way, likes to call itself New England's largest college daily.

The Collegian is located deep down in the bowels of the Campus Center. Don't worry, most people can never find it, either. And, of course, those who do find it we often wish didn't.

It is the largest registered student organization, and can be the greatest place to work in — if you don't have an aversion toward caffeine, stress and no windows. It's fun only if you make it fun.

If you ever find us, we'll give you a news story to write, or something to type in for our lazy editors. Another perk of becoming a staff writer is that you might get to achieve the notoriety usually accorded to anybody who writes often enough for this newspaper. Not even membership in the Juggling Club can beat that.

Don't try to figure out Machmer. There is no logic to the sequence of room numbers, and trying to figure it out will only take time away from trying to find any of the science buildings.

Don't spit, throw up or otherwise throw anything into the Campus Pond. Or I'll write about you.

During the spring, that side of the Student Union Building facing the Pond becomes "Hippie Beach." If you're anti-social like me, head straight for the Pond. The ducks are fine conversationalists, and you don't have to smell them.

And, don't look forward so much to moving off campus, unless, of course,you want to live in the midst of people who lose their morals as soon as the Ryder truck with Mom and Dad pulls away.

The best advice I can give: Have fun while you're trying to survive. Anybody who gets out of college unscathed must have had a really boring time. Don't be a wuss. Get yourself all wet and bruised.

Good luck and enjoy: college lasts but four short years

Welcome to the University of Massachusetts.

The University is famous for a very prominent School of Management and a fabulous School of Engineering. UMass is also famous for protests and take-overs, Hatch fries, and a community which boasts of its diverse constituency.

There are people from all over the world at this University, each with their own viewpoint and agenda. The viewpoints range from right to left; from the anti-human "you all suck" to the "I love everybody." They all have their good and bad points, but most people are a happy (and sometimes apathetic) medium.

At the University, chances are you'll stay up late on your floor every night and talk about a plethora of topics — religion and politics, parties (the favorite) and hang-overs (the least favorite), and what's for dinner.

The latter three aren't very intimidating, but the others — the things people tell you never to talk about at parties — just might come up a little more than you might expect.

Because of these conversations which will probably make you think the guy three doors down is a fascist pig or the woman across the hall is a communist, there are a couple of things you should keep in mind as you wander all over this campus, tripping over ducks and eating bagels. Here they are:

Gayle Long

1. Keep an open mind. There are so many great things here at the University, don't miss out.

People here are constantly putting on programming and trying to educate each other about the wonders of the world and the people in it.

Take advantage of the Five Colleges — they have some great lecturers, comedians, movies, films and the like, and believe it or not — you could learn something.

2. Determine your own opinions. There are a lot of people at the University who want everyone to see everything their way.

Learn to see it for what it is — what it means to you. People may try and convince you you're wrong — but let your conscience be your guide.

Don't be afraid to ditch all the things you learned in high school or at home — sometimes those people can be wrong, too.

Listen to both sides of an argument and figure out what seems to be the best for the world you want to live in.

3. Stand up for yourself. Don't let anyone push you around. If you feel so strongly about it — defend it to the hilt. Don't wait for the rest of the world to take sides before you choose up — there is nothing worse than a person who follows the crowd.

Part of being in college, unlike high school, is to break free of the clique (believe it or not) and determine what your life is going to be like.

Life isn't cliques, cars and crushes, you know.

4. Have fun and learn all you can. Obviously, college is supposed to be a learning experience — otherwise you wouldn't be here, I think.

Anyway, the most important thing you can learn is to balance the fun and the work. If you're working a job and trying to carry a full course load, then having fun is the key.

Go out, see a movie, go to a party (non-alcoholic, of course) and make new friends. The friends you make in college are the best — they're there for you when you're sober — and disappear when you're not. No, in all seriousness, the people you meet in college help you to decide what you are going to be like for the rest of your existance.

Good luck. Take advantage of what UMass really is — a small city with 25,000 students and who knows how many faculty and staff. (There's a lot of them). The University is nothing without the people in it, and you too are now a part of the greatness of it all.

Enjoy.

Tiny bubbles of champagne adds sparkle to celebrations

HYDE PARK N.Y. (AP) — The beginning of summer is filled with reasons to rejoice: graduations, weddings and festive outdoor parties.

Champagne is synonymous with celebrations. The mystique of champagne and its sparkling presence make it among the most popular of beverages for life's special moments.

All champagne is sparkling wine, but not all sparkling wine is champagne. Although many countries, including the United States, Spain, Italy and France produce sparkling premium wines, true champagne comes only from the designated growing region — called Champagne — in northern France.

What are the factors which contribute to the quality of French champagne?

First, the characteristic of the soil in the region enhance the character of the grapes produced there. The chalk in the soil absorbs heat from the sun during the day to moderate cool evening temperatures, and it also retains water to offset the times of draught.

Second, the widely-imitated "champagne method" produces finer and smaller beads or bubbles that add to the visual allures and are absolutely necessary for cleansing the palate.

Michael Weiss, instructor for the Culinary Institute of America's management of wines and spirits class, says the production of Champagne in France is strictly controlled.

Weiss says grapes can be planted only at vineyard sites whose soil and exposure best enhances the varietal characteristics that contribute to the blend of "cuvee," the secret patent of each wine maker.

"The white chardonnay grape provides delicacy as well as apple, nut and citrus aromas," he says. "The red grapes, pinot noir and pinot meunior, provide structure, acidity and a scent of berries."

There are strict governmental controls regarding the appearance of the vineyard name on the label. This usually occurs when the champagne is produced in one of the 17 villages that have been granted "grand cru," status, meaning literally "great growth," from the finest sites in the district, when the vineyard name is on the label, the champagne will always have a dry style, or "brut."

Wines are also labeled by the amount of sugar added after the second fermentation. Extra brut is "bone" dry. Extra dry is slightly sweeter than brut. Demi-sec and doux are noted for its light style. Rose champagnes are the most full-bodied; they range in color from salmon pink to cherry red.

Vintage have more body than non-vintage champagnes, and by law they must be brut or have a "curvee de prestige," designation, signifying they are the companies finest offering, Weiss said.

Now you can afford to dream in color.

If you thought that finding a color Macintosh* system you could afford was just a dream, then the new, affordable Macintosh LC is a dream come true.

The Macintosh LC is rich in color. Unlike many computers that can display only 16 colors at once, the Macintosh LC expands your palette to 256 colors. It also comes with a microphone and new sound-input technology that lets you personalize your work by adding voice or other sounds.

Like every Macintosh computer, the LC is easy to set up and easy to master. And it runs thousands of available applications that all work in the same, consistent way—so once you've learned one program, you're well on your way to learning them all. The Macintosh LC even lets you share information with someone who uses a different type of computer—thanks to the versatile Apple* SuperDrive,* which can read from and write to Macintosh, MS-DOS, OS/2, and Apple II floppy disks.

Take a look at the Macintosh LC and see what it gives you. Then pinch yourself. It's better than a dream—it's a Macintosh.

ARTS & LIVING

Five College Area offers musical diversity

By PAUL DeGEORGES
Collegian Staff

Hey kids . . . it's Happy Valley Time! And unless you're from the area, sitting in a stiflingly hot room taking annoying placement exams might actually seem like the most entertainment you can find at UMass. But that's 'cause it's summer and three-fourths of the town population takes off, leaving the area to quietly recuperate.

So slooshy well oh my brothers and sisters, your humble narrator has good news. The Five College area is, from the beginning of September to the end of May, quite a swell place for theater, concerts, lectures, art exhibits, films, shopping, dancing, eating, or pretty much anything else you might want to do for a cathartic break from studying.

One of the main attractions in the area is the selection of clubs which provide opportunities to see some of the best acts on tour.

So if it's music you're after, the amount and quality of acts that come here is, to say the least impressive. Without travelling further than the UMass Fine Arts Center or Student Union Ballroom, you can catch some top performers from just about every genre. Or you could simply hop on the PVTA Bus to get to any of the area clubs and you'll be treated to even more acts.

Jazz is big. Last year enthusiasts were treated to the like of Branford Marsalis, Don Cherry, Ricky Ford and Sun Ra. Archie Shepp teaches classes at the University and the infamous Max Roach periodically comes as a visiting professor to teach a course. There are also excellent jazz ensembles at UMass and Amherst College.

Last year brought a lot of nifty World Beat/Dance bands to the area including Johnny Clegg and Savvuka, Flor de Cana, Ladysmith Black Mambazo, TXAI, Bim Skala Bim, The Toasters and the "hip-shaking Afro-pop" quintet from Zaire, Loketo.

Crowd at Fugazi

Koko Taylor, Roosevelt "Booba" Barnes, The Neville Brothers, Johnny Winter, Robert Jr. Lockwood, and Buddy Guy were just some of the performers who gave Amherst and Northampton the Blues in '91.

Folk singers John Gorka, Brooks Williams, John Hartford and Shawn Colvin strummed away, along with a host of local folk stars some of whom are provided by the Pioneer Valley Folklore Society in Greenfield. Oh, yeah, in case you didn't hear, Bob Dylan played at UMass too.

Classical Enthusiasts were afforded wonderful performances by Chamber Choirs and soloists from the Five Colleges, the Wind Ensemble, Madrigal Singers, the Five College Orchestra and many faculty recitals as well as professional orchestras and soloists.

If your weakness is progressive, then don't forget your Doc's, because last semester alone provided firehoce, Jane's Addiction, Fugazi, Bob Mould, Fishbone, and Jesus Jones . . . just to name a few.

There are also plenty of local groups which simply shouldn't be missed. Some that should be seen before they stop being the area's well kept secrets and go the way of other local heroes Dinosaur Jr. and Suzanne Vega are: Cordelia's Dad, an innovative and catchy Celtic-rock combo; Rockin' Dave and the Rent Party, an irresistably energetic Zydeco/Funk band; and The Jovial Skumz (formerly The Thrashing Skumz) — once uptight, now lighthearted, soon to be huge.

So if you're sitting around the vast and empty campus wondering if you'll ever get to do something fun, lament not. Between UMass, the other four colleges, and all the area clubs, if you don't find something entertaining you may as well keep reading Nietzsche.

The Black Women's Survival Kit was presented this past semester by the New World Theatre group, just one of the many theatre groups in the Five-College area. Don't limit yourself at University

By DANIELLE DOWLING
Collegian Staff

The four or five or six years, depending both on your major and alcoholic consumption, that you spend at college can be an enriching experience, if you allow it to be.

If you are so inclined to spend your time in college as a slave to your hormones or a slave to the library, you will certainly miss out on many opportunities that a large university like UMass can allow for you in which you could expand your horizons.

ATTACK

Take me for example. When I came to college four years ago, I was a smart ass kid from the Bronx who thought she knew everything and definitely knew what music she liked or didn't like. That was that. Led Zeppelin, Metallica and Pink Floyd — those were the only bands worthy of my aural attention.

But slowly this started to change. First, I was exposed to many more thrash and metal bands, then it was the college/alternative scene that made my left toe explode with delight. Finally, in my senior year, my musical horizons reached every point possible, with the exception of muzak, country-and-western and Barry Manilow — but that's totally understandable.

Once I started working for WMUA, our maginificiant college radio station (no, that announcement wasn't paid for by the folks at MUA), every crevice of my aural cavities was exposed to the most wonderful conglomeration of noise to which I would not otherwise be exposed. And the two jazz classes I took gave me an appreciative sense of the roots of rock-n-roll and the musical contributions of African-Americans.

In short, don't limit yourself. Explore every artistic crevice of this campus, sample every kind of music — this might be the only chance you have to enjoy such culture.

Area art is easy to find

The Five College Area is loaded with art. From music to dance to theater you can pretty much find it all. There are also many excellent art galleries around which are continuously stocked with wonderful works and regularly supply us with great temporary exhibits by students and professionals.

At the University of Massachusetts alone there are seven separate galleries available to students and the public including The Augusta Savage Gallery located in New Africa House; Hampden Gallery in Southwest at the Hampden Dining Common; Student Union Gallery in the Student Union, pond level; The University Gallery which can be found in the Fine Arts Center, ground floor; Herter Gallery in Herter Hall North, ground floor and Wheeler Gallery in the Wheeler Residential Hall in Central. Also, in the Tower Library there are Archives and Special Collections.

Amherst College offers the Mead Art Museum, Hampshire College houses the Hampshire Library Gallery and at Mount Holyoke College there is the Mount Holyoke College Art Museum.

Smith College provides the Five College community with four galleries: The Smith College Museum of Art, The Alumnae Gymnasium Reading Room, William Alan Neilson Library and Hillyer Hall Gallery.

(seventh in the nation) while hitting six home runs with 34 RBIs. She also had five triples on the year. Marean was unable to compete in the NCAA's due to a hand injury.

Other starters that are returning for Sortino include catcher Sherri Kuchiskas (.348, 4 HR, 32 RBI), left fielder Peggy Bush (.310, with 20 RBI) and thirdbaseman Laurie Dondarski.

Sophmore Tracy DuEst filled in for Marean during the A-10 championships and the NCAA's and did a solid job. DuEst was named to the A-10 all tournament team and should be a candidate for a starters position next season.

Last year UMass was ranked No. 13 in the NCAA preseason poll and went all the way to the NCAA Regionals, defeating Connecticut before being ousted by the University of Nevada at Las Vegas. This upcoming season the results could very easily, be even better for the Minutewomen.

Football looks to repeat as YanCon champions

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

Last season, the University of Massachusetts football team (8-2-1) won more regular season games than any football team in school history, won the Yankee Conference for the first time since 1978, beat Delaware for the first time in 14 meetings dating back to 1958 and then got trounced by William and Mary 38-0 in the Division I-AA playoffs.

Coach Jim Reid was named Coach of the Year, sophomore quarterback Gary Wilkos won Co-Offensive Player of the year honors (more on him in a minute) and freshman tailback John Johnson was awarded Rookie of the Year.

Wilkos who fractured vertebrae at the base of his neck in a game against Delaware is a question mark for the upcoming season. He has been walking around campus with a neck brace which is screwed into his head. He has also been seen shooting baskets at the Southwest Horseshoe. Just a guess, but don't bet on him playing football for UMass this season.

Late in November, Reid said, "We have no idea about Wilkos, we're assuming he'll never play football again and if we get him back, then that's a plus."

The big question then, is who is going to be the starting quarterback for the Minutemen in 1991? After Wilkos' injury, Reid used three different quarterbacks; junior Paul Tornatore, sophomore Tom Fasano and freshman Dave McGovern, all of whom are returning.

If 1990 was any indication, the running game will be strong for the next three years. Senior Jerome Bledsoe will return from a medical red-shirt season to join Johnson, freshman Eric Thimas and red-shirt freshman Demetrius Owens.

Four members of the offensive line — center Jay Gabbe, tackle Al Pogarian, and guards Tony Giudice and Paul Mayberry graduated. Mayberry is hoping to catch on with a team in the World Football League.

Tackle Steve Brothers and safety Pat Doran are the lone seniors who graduated from the second-ranked defense in the nation.

Court to decide on Herndon's eligibility

The University of Massachusetts sports scene saw its share of excitement this past year, but there wasn't a bigger story than the "rage in the Cage."

UMass basketball reached its peak this season when they traveled to the world renowned Madison Square Garden for the Final Four of the National Invitational Tournament. The Minutemen, underdogs throughout the tournament, lost in the semifinals to Stanford, 73-71.

Nonetheless, the team returned to Amherst with their heads held high. The Minutemen eclipsed the 20-win plateau, finishing 20-13. They tied for third place in the Atlantic 10 and were undefeated against nine New England teams.

All of last year's heroics will be a thing of the past though. This season, the Minutemen have a big challenge in improving on last year. The next step; an NCAA tournament bid.

Head coach John Calipari, becoming a household name in the basketball world, will have four returning starters. Junior center Harper Williams, senior point guard Anton Brown, junior forward Tony Barbee and senior shooting guard Jim McCoy will all be back.

Cage fans have their fingers crossed for the return of high-flying senior forward Will Herndon. Herndon transferred to Massachusetts from Richmond his freshman year and may have to pay a stiff penalty handed out by the NCAA eligibility committee and forfeit his senior season. Stay tuned.

However, UMass fans can look forward to seeing some new faces on the floor. Coach Calipari has a five-player recruiting class that has been touted as one of the best in the conference.

Students new to the Amherst campus can look forward to top notch A-10 action in the Cage including powerhouses Temple, Rutgers, and Penn State. In addition, the Minutemen will put Massachusetts basketball on the map as they travel to Alaska and face the top teams in the nation in the Great Alaskan Shootout.

The hot spots of UM sports

When you pay the bill to come to this wonderful University, there is a small thing called an "athletic fee."

This item, about $90, gets you a free seat in every sporting event on this campus — except when we occasionally make the NCAAs or the NIT or some other tournament.

So, remember these hot spots for all you sporting fans:

The Cage. When you're waiting outside in the mass of people pressing in a giant surge towards the student entrance holding their student IDs — you might think, "do I really give a damn whether or not I get in?"

But once inside, you will never doubt your loyalty to the UMass basketball team or the jam-packed stands inside the Curry Hicks Cage. The Cage is the epitome of school spirit. Everyone cheers and paints their faces — we even sing along with the band — something you'd never do in high school.

Last season, the men's basketball team went to the finals of the NIT. It was an exciting season. Look for them again next year. It's sure to be action packed.

Who studies on the night of a home game? No one. And if you do miss a game to study, chances are you'll wish you didn't.

McGuirk Alumni Stadium. As you drive past the Stadium on Route 116, the sign in front says "Home of UMass Minuteman Football," but what it should say is "Home of rainy, muddy homecomings and empty stands."

There's nothing wrong with the football team. They actually won the Yankee Conference last year. But the stadium is so far away, and tailgating has been outlawed, so the fun is gone.

But the games are good, and (even though homecoming last year was in a driving rain storm which washed all the fans away) when the weather is nice, the hike down to the Stadium is pretty good. I think the day when they actually fill the Stadium (and I'm not talking about graduation) is coming soon.

So, go to a game, buy some peanuts and popcorn and have some fun. Maybe before you graduate they'll bring tailgating back.

Boyden Hill. Home of the UMass Lax team. That's lacrosse for all of you, who like me, had no idea what lacrosse was. People call them the Gorillas (don't ask me why). But when you're ranked ninth in the nation, you don't ask too many questions.

Boyden Hill is right behind (logically enough) Boyden Gymnasium, and spectators sit on "the Hill," in the nice Amherst spring months. This year, the team was knocked out of the NCAA Tournament in the first round — but they'll be back.

Totman Field. Maybe not the most exciting name, but some of the most exciting sports are played at Totman by the UMass women's softball team. This year the team was number one in the north, going 15-0 in the Atlantic 10. They deserve more attention, so go and watch a game or two.

Any way you go, you can't lose being a UMass sports fan.

UP IN THE AIR — William Herndon hopes to be soaring past opponents, igniting the crowd with his thunderous dunks, but he'll have to wait and see what the court decides about his eligibility.

Mullins Arena taking shape

By BRETT MORRIS

On your way to campus this summer, you may have noticed a new building sprouting up on the west side of campus that wasn't there when you first visited. All you can see now is mounds of dirt and steel girders. Nonetheless, it is the ground work for the Mullins Memorial Center, which began construction in January.

Mullins Arena, named after William D. Mullins, the late Democratic State Representative from Ludlow, is scheduled for completion in February 1993. It will be a two building, multi-use complex. The larger building will serve as a combination convocation center and sports/entertainment arena. The smaller one will house an Olympic-sized ice hockey rink. The main arena will seat from 4,280 for theatrical performances to 10,214 for concerts and sporting events. The total cost of the arena is 39.095 million dollars.

Commencement is scheduled to be held there in May 1993.

With the increasing popularity of the Massachusetts men's basketball program, the new arena is a welcome sight to the fans who couldn't get seats in the Curry Hicks Cage. On several occasions this season students were turned away as a result of capacity crowds in the Cage.

In addition, the new arena will provide adequate facilities for the formation of a hockey team. The Amherst campus has not competed in intercollegiate hockey since the 1978-79 season.

Softball's a big success

There are a few successful sports programs at the University of Massachusetts and one of them is the softball team.

This past spring the Minutewomen compiled a 39-13 record, they competed for the third time in the NCAA Championship Tournament, they compiled a perfect 15-0 record in the Atlantic 10, they finished the season ranked No. 18 in the country and were No. 1 in the North.

Next year the team looks to be just as good. Although some key players graduated, coach Elaine Sortino has a strong squad returning.

Once again, the Minutewomen will be led by their pitching staff. The A-10 Pitcher of the Year in 1991 Darlene Claffey will be the number one starter, barring some unforseen event. The sophomore went 21-6 with a 1.05 ERA this past season. She struckout 115 batters, threw four no hitters and shutout the opposition 15 times.

The second half of the UMass rotation is A-10 Player of the Year Holly Aprile. The junior won 18 games while dropping seven decisions. She had a 1.15 ERA and registered two saves.

At the plate Aprile batted over .400 most of the year before dropping to .391 at seasons end. Aprile, who plays centerfield when she is not pitching, hit two home runs and drove in 37 runs.

Another stand out at the plate for UMass was senior Barb Marean. The shortstop batted a team high .445
